The late Senator La Follette foresaw the effect of the Esch-Cummins law in this respect, for he said:

But with the Esch-Cummins law on the books, the public has a vital interest in these criminally lavish expenditures, because the public pays the bill * * * the cost of maintenance is advanced three-quarters of a billion dollars in one year on the item of repair work on engines and cars alone. * * * This is one angle of the repair scandal. (La Follette's Magazine, January, 1921, p. 2.)

But that extravagance and mismanagement of railways is not confined to these last 10 years is evident from this statement, made by Henry Ford in 1921:

The big lines are not being run correctly. Those who own them care more about the market value and market manipulations of their stock than they do about giving service to the people. Those who operate them from high positions are being paid too highly for the little they know and do. Railroading, I have found, is one of the most inefficiently conducted businesses in the world to-day. (La Follette's Magazine, November, 1921, p. 164.)

It seems to me a curious sort of logic or ethics that mismanagement and inefficiency and deception of the public should be rewarded rather than penalized. Moreover, it is an absurd assumption that the cure for this continued inefficiency, mismanagement, and extravagance is a gift of more money from the United States Treasury.

Two questions come to my mind when I consider such testimony as this from these authorities. What is our Interstate Commerce Commission doing all this time? In view of these practices heretofore and since, have the commissioners given such evidence of reliability and efficiency that we should intrust them with further discretionary power? And how long shall we rush to the assistance of the railroads with funds out of the National Treasury?

H. R. 9551—NELSON BILL

I am not on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, and I do not pretend to be a railroad expert, but I have made a study of railroad legislation, and I could see from following the hearings that this demand for railroad legislation was largely ex parte. I wished the committee to have more material before it. So I asked the Interstate Commerce Commission for specific data relative to the 446 railroads having "estimated recapture liability." (P. 347, Hearings on H. R. 7116 and 7117.)

My requests of the commission were as follows:

First. Roads which have paid recapture and amount paid by each road.

Second. Roads which have had hearings or upon which reports have been served.

Third. Roads which are under suspicion or which the commission has on a list as probably subject to recapture.

Fourth. List of coal and steel roads making up the 42 per cent referred to by Commissioner Eastman.

Fifth. Amount of recapture due from each of these coal, steel, and larger carriers as compared with the amount due from small carriers.

Sixth. Amount of recapture each of the coal and steel roads has paid in.

Seventh. Statement of the dividends paid by each of these roads for each recapture year.

Eighth. Statement of net railway-operating income and net income for each of these roads for the last two years available.

Ninth. Statement of corporate surplus for each of these roads for the last two years available and for the beginning of the recapture period.

Tenth. Net railway-operating income of the roads in recapture.

Eleventh. List of railroads for which the commission furnished a statement of estimated recapture liability for the period 1920–1930, showing the corporate control either by other railroads or by any industry.

Twelfth. Excess cost of ties and rails which have been installed as replacements and have been charged to operating expenses.

The compiling of these data resulted in much information on the recapture phase, and Commissioner Eastman stated that he furnished this to the committee at my request (pp. 344, 345, 347, hearings).

On February 3, 1932, I addressed a letter to Chairman RAYBURN, of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House, acquainting him with an itemized list of my requests from the commission to date. Later on I asked the commission for further material, some of which was not prepared until after the close of the hearings. This I am hereto appending (Exhibits I, II, and III). The commission, pursuant to my request relative to corporate control of these roads, furnished me all the information available; but this is too voluminous to be inserted in the RECORD, although it does not appear in the hearings.

These statistics which I called for show among other facts what these roads owe the Government, dividends paid to their stockholders, the amounts of their corporate surpluses, railway-operating revenues, and replacements charged to operating expenses. (Exhibits I, II, and III, and pp. 359–438; 556–568, hearings.) These figures prove that if recapture is repealed the money will go in most cases to rich roads, bankers, and large corporations—steel companies and Morgan and like interests.

Then I introduced a bill which to my mind would safeguard the public interest and would modify the existing law sufficiently to meet the needs of the present emergency. Certain of the short lines deserve sympathy. I do not include here those short lines that are affiliated with the big corporations—they are steadily making big profits year after year. I do not include either the "dead timber"—the 30,000 miles of "useless" and "socially wasteful" roads to which Mr. Lewis refers on page 531 of the hearings. These lines should be abandoned. If this were done the reputed 2 or 3 per cent aggregate earnings of our transportation system would be materially raised, for the inclusion of these useless roads pulls down the average. But there are other short lines vital to rural communities which the 3-year average would, in all fairness, protect.

To bring the loan fund within reach of weak roads, I propose that the interest rate be fluctuated so as to be comparable with securities of like character and also that the purposes for which the loan may be used be liberalized. That railroads may not be unduly forced to make recapture payments which would cripple them at a time of depression, I have provided for a "moratorium." But I propose that a law similar to our income tax law put "teeth" into the determination by the Interstate Commerce Commission of recapturable moneys and the immediate payment by railroads. Then, if there is adjustment to be made, it would come later, as in our income tax. Under such a law, after a few test cases this bugaboo of litigation would cease. Since the Supreme Court has ruled in Smyth v. Ames (169 U. S. 466) that value is "the basis of all calculations as to reasonableness of rates" and in Dayton-Goose Creek v. United States, (263 U. S. 456, pp. 479–480), that recapture is "the key provision of the plan" (meaning rate-making), I propose to leave our rate structure as it is with the single exception of providing that the percentage of value which would constitute a "fair return" thereon be specified annually by the Interstate Commerce Commission. In my bill, H. R. 9551, which I introduced on February 19, I have offered at least a constructive compromise measure which seems to me to meet the objections of 12 years' experience with the present law.

AN UNJUSTIFIABLE PROPOSITION

The unjustifiable iniquity of this whole measure is, however, the grant of $360,000,000 to these special interests. They justify it on the plea that if you give it back to some, you must give it back to all. That is a strange kind of justice when the "all" have been declared by the Supreme Court to have no claims upon this fund and can not have, by any sort of title or property rights therein. The funds came from the people. Let us consider more in detail the enormity of this proposition. From the figures called for from the commission, the following summary is illuminating.

Class	Estimated liability	Per cent
I	$336,443,378	93.08
II	15,929,742	4.41
III	2,259,036	.62
IV	6,833,659	1.89

Of the total recapture liability, 93 per cent, or three hundred and thirty-six millions, goes to the rich Class I roads.

From the tables furnished me by the commission it is to be observed that the total computed recapture liability for three roads alone—the Chesapeake & Ohio, Norfolk & Western, and the Duluth, Missabe & Northern—amounts to $115,348,909. (Hearings, p. 556, Nos. 1, 2, and 3.) This, then, would be the amount of the gift we would make to these railroads.

The corporate surplus of the Chesapeake & Ohio in 1930 was $175,629,633; dividend declared on its common stock in 1930 was 10 per cent. (Hearings, p. 387.) The corporate surplus of the Norfolk & Western in 1930 was $202,140,584; its common stock paid dividends of 12 per cent. (Hearings, p. 404.) The Duluth, Missabe & Northern had a corporate surplus in 1930 of $67,143,142 and its common-stock dividends were 100 per cent. (Hearings, p. 426.) Out of pity to these poor roads let us give them this dole!

Let us look at this proposed liberality from another point of view. Let us consider the $10,000,000 that have actually been paid in. (Exhibit I.) Of this sum, over eight millions have been paid under protest by railroads controlled by industries, and the larger part by railroads controlled by the United States Steel Corporation, the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, and other iron and steel industries. (See Exhibit I and Eastman's testimony, hearings, p. 9.) Do the United States Steel Corporation, the Bethlehem Steel Corporation need this dole of $8,000,000? Finally, let us consider the $2,000,000, in round numbers, collected without protest. Just think, only $1,893,703 out of $360,000,000 have been paid into the Treasury without protest during the prosperous years 1920–1930. Poor Henry Ford paid in $239,461.33 without protest.

What right have we to pay these steel roads and Henry Ford this $10,000,000 or more?

We, Members of Congress, are assessing ourselves in this emergency an 11 per cent salary cut. This sum amounts annually to $438,075. In four and one-half years of salary cut we will be able to make up only the $1,893,703.62 paid in without protest. By cutting our mileage and stationery allowance we may be able to squeeze up to $2,000,000. But what is that, if we can sacrifice and make the United States Steel, Bethlehem Steel, and Henry Ford prosperous and happy?

I can not support H. R. 11677, and I hope the rule asked for will not be granted.

ADMIRAL FREDERICK C. BILLARD

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks touching the life, character, and public service of the late Commandant of the United States Coast Guard, Admiral Frederick C. Billard, whose death occurred in this city on the 17th of this month.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I deem it appropriate to make this formal reference to the life, character, and public service of one of the Nation's most popular and capable officials, Rear Admiral Frederick Chamberlayne Billard, who died in the city of Washington on the 17th of this month.

During the nine years I have been in the House of Representatives I have served as a member of the Appropriations Committee and of the Treasury-Post Office Departments subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee. Because of my membership and work on this subcommittee I was thrown into official relationship with Admiral Billard throughout this period. Annually he came before the subcommittee at its hearings on the Treasury-Post Office Departments appropriation bill and, with his staff, presented the justifications for the various appropriation items carried therein.

Through this contact I became very much interested in the Coast Guard Service and learned in this first-hand way of its outstanding achievements. Thus, also, I have been able to judge as to the character of work performed by Admiral Billard since he has been Commandant of the Coast Guard, since 1924. His record in that capacity, in my judgment, has never been excelled by any predecessor, and perhaps never equaled.

Admiral Billard was born in the District of Columbia on September 22, 1873, the son of Dr. Jules Frederick and Lillian (Johnson) Billard. He attended Baltimore City College, from which institution he graduated in 1892. Having successfully passed the examination for entrance into the then Revenue Cutter Service, he was appointed a cadet from Maryland on January 11, 1894. He thereupon received a large portion of his cadet training on board the old practice ship Chase, and graduated second in his class. He was commissioned an ensign on April 27, 1896, and passed through the various grades of the Coast Guard Service until he reached the post of commandant, having been appointed thereto on January 11, 1924, with the rank of rear admiral, exactly 30 years after receiving his appointment as cadet. On January 11, 1928, he was reappointed commandant for another 4-year term, and was again reappointed for another like term on January 11, 1932. Three appointments to the chief station or office in the Coast Guard Service was, and is, without a precedent. At the time of his death he had been connected with that service more than 38 years.

Admiral Billard during his long and responsible career in the Coast Guard served on all the coasts of the United States, as well as in Alaskan, Hawaiian, and West Indian waters. During the Spanish-American War he served on the U. S. S. Corwin, attached to the Pacific Fleet. From 1900 to 1905 he was navigator and instructor on the practice ship Chase. From 1906 to 1911 he was aide to Capt. Worth G. Ross, Chief of the Revenue Cutter Service. In 1914 he was appointed as superintendent of the Coast Guard Academy at New London, Conn., serving in that capacity from 1914 to 1918. Thereupon, at his request to serve afloat, he was placed in command of the U. S. S. Aphrodite, operating in the European war zone during the World War. This ship was the first American war vessel to pass through the Kiel Canal after the signing of the armistice. He was awarded the Navy cross for service in European waters. In May, 1919, he returned from Europe, and in September of that year was detailed as aide to the Commandant of the Coast Guard, serving in that capacity until appointed commandant on January 11, 1924, for his first 4-year term.

Hence, Admiral Billard, at the time of his death, was serving his ninth year as Commandant of the Coast Guard.

In 1920 he married Miss Clara F. Prentis, of New London, Conn., who, as well as his three brothers and a sister, survive him.

HISTORY AND CHARACTER OF THE COAST GUARD SERVICE

Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary to speak in terms of extended praise touching the invaluable services the United States Coast Guard has rendered through all the years of our national history. It is one of the Nation's oldest activities, having been established in 1790, during the first Congress in the first administration of President Washington. A paramount duty of the Coast Guard is the protection of life and property from the perils of the sea; and it was a matter of great pride and gratification with Admiral Billard that this phase of Coast Guard work has been marked by a record of achievement which stands above that of any other life-saving organization in the world. During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1931, the Coast Guard rescued from danger, or saved, the lives of 5,627 persons, and the value of vessels assisted, together with their cargoes, aggregated $47,959,465.

The work of the Coast Guard is varied in an unusual degree. In addition to its life-saving work, another outstanding activity which has always claimed its attention is the prevention of smuggling of every character. In recent years this phase of service has extended to the highly perilous and difficult work of preventing the entry into the United States of contraband liquors prohibited by Federal law.

All these activities, during his service as commandant, were supervised and directed by Admiral Billard; and the noteworthy character of his service was attested by his reappointments as commandant. Within the period of this supervision and direction Coast Guard problems assumed a greater magnitude and importance than ever before. This service has always had its ideals and traditions, similar to those which have always inspired our Army and Navy forces; and, like the Army and Navy, the Coast Guard in remaining true to its traditions and ideals has ever preserved its superb morale and maintained its high standard of achievement.

CHARACTER AND CHARACTERISTICS

Quiet and modest sailor though he was, Admiral Billard nevertheless possessed a rugged force of character. He knew how to obey and how to command. His professional and executive abilities were of the highest order; and it was inevitable that he should rise to chief command in the Coast Guard. His strong, genial, and sympathetic character invited and impelled friendship. Officers and men throughout the service loved and were loyal to him. His discipline was of a character wise and efficient, rather than stern or arbitrary. Under his administration the service rose, perhaps, to the highest point of effective achievement attained in all its history.

In the discharge of his important duties Admiral Billard literally wore himself out. One of the latest tasks which came to him—and one which singularly appealed to his ardent and sympathetic nature—was that of supervising the search by the Coast Guard fleet in the Atlantic waters to find the Lindbergh baby and the dastardly kidnapers that have written into American history one of its most tragic and sinister pages.

A little more than 58 years of age at his death, his life would doubtless have been substantially lengthened except for the overwhelming burdens which he undertook to bear. In all truth, he spent himself for the public good. And now, having achieved so much and gone at length to his final reward, he deserves and will receive the enduring gratitude of the Nation he loved so well and whose interests he so faithfully and effectively served.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT TRIBUTE

The Coast Guard, in peace times, is an activity of the Treasury Department (but in time of war it operates as a part of the Navy). In consequence, a period of mourning for Admiral Billard, by direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Ogden L. Mills, has been directed for a period of 15 days, beginning May 18. During that time all ships and stations of the Coast Guard are directed to display half-mast colors, and all officers to wear official mourning. In addition, the Secretary addressed to the Coast Guard a tribute to Admiral Billard, in the following language:

In the passing of your beloved Commandant, I wish to pay the highest tribute to his noble character and unselfish and devoted service to the Coast Guard and Nation, which he has served continuously since 1894. Since 1924, he has been Commandant of the Coast Guard during its period of greatest expansion and development of its highest efficiency. He was not only a sailorman in every sense of the word, but was an executive of the highest order. Through his death the country loses an invaluable public servant.

AN IRREPARABLE LOSS

Mr. Speaker, I know that the many friends of Admiral Billard, in both branches of Congress, who, during the years of his service as Commandant of the Coast Guard, like myself, have been thrown into intimate contact with him, and have come to appreciate his splendid character and service, feel as I do, that in his death, the Nation which he so long and honorably served, has sustained an irreparable loss. All these, too, I am sure, join with me in giving expression to sentiments of the most earnest sympathy for his devoted and sorrowing helpmate, and the others of his family, because of the great bereavement which has come to them.

And now, in hallowed Arlington, the Nation's Valhalla, the dust of our beloved friend shall sleep through the years to come, while his knightly spirit shall go marching on; and so long as our flag may grace the sky the memory of his life and deeds shall constitute an inspiration of the noblest character to those who shall follow after him in the service in which he so long and so splendidly wrought.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 20, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

7841. Also, letter from Luther O. Griffith, Griffith Lumber Co., of Huntington, W. Va., opposing the Davis-Kelly coal bill as detrimental to the bituminous-coal industry; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

7842. Also, letter from the executive vice president of the First Huntington National Bank Building, Huntington, W. Va., protesting against the passage of the legislation known as the Davis-Kelly coal control bill; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

7843. By Mr. SMITH of West Virginia: Resolution of the Fayetteville District Political and Civic Club, of Fayetteville, W. Va., opposing the Davis-Kelly coal bill; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

7844. By Mr. STEWART: Resolution of the Morristown Chamber of Commerce, Morristown, N. J., favoring economy legislation, the balancing of the Budget, and approving the action of the Committee on Ways and Means in reporting adversely the bills providing for the payment of the soldiers' bonus; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. ASHURST presented memorials of sundry citizens of Phoenix and Tucson, Ariz., remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on the automobile industry, and favoring instead some form of general sales tax to be included in the pending revenue bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CONNALLY presented resolutions adopted by the voters' committee, Blum, Tex., opposing economy in veterans' legislation and the issuance of bonds or the imposition of taxation for relief purposes, and favoring the issuance of new currency for all relief measures, such relief to be "in the form of jobs and not charity," which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TYDINGS presented resolutions adopted by the Men's Bible Class of the First Baptist Church, Baltimore, Md., favoring the adoption of measures to bring about the apprehension and punishment of the Lindbergh baby kidnapers and murderers, and also such measures as will prevent the repetition of crimes of this nature, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of the State of Maryland, remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on the automobile industry, and favoring the raising of revenue by some form of general taxation, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Nellie S. Watson, registered nurse, and several other doctors and nurses of Tacoma Park, Md., praying for the passage of legislation providing for the dissemination of contraceptive information (birth control), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BARBOUR presented memorials of sundry citizens of the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on the automobile industry, and favoring some form of general tax be included in lieu thereof in the pending revenue bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorial of the Sons of American Revolution in congress assembled, remonstrating against any further reductions in the strength of the Regular Army or any curtailment in the training of citizen components of the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Morristown (N. J.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring the immediate passage of legislation effecting economy and retrenchment in Federal expenditures, and opposing the adoption of so-called bonus proposals at the present time, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Kiwanis Club of Hammonton in the Chamber of Commerce of Newark, in the State of New Jersey, favoring the balancing of the Budget as far as possible by retrenchment in governmental expenditures rather than increased taxes, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts presented letters in the nature of petitions from 300 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for the passage of legislation to balance the Budget, and also for the support of the President's economy program, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented papers in the nature of petitions from 325 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for retrenchment in governmental expenditures and the balancing of the Budget through taxation on some such basis as is offered by a general sales tax, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented papers in the nature of petitions from 175 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for the balancing of the Budget, the defeat of cash-bonus proposals, and the stopping of "raids on the Treasury," etc., which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented papers in the nature of petitions from 255 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for the modification of the Volstead Act and the repeal of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented papers in the nature of petitions from 180 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for the passage of legislation establishing a pension system for railroad employees, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH presented letters in the nature of memorials from sundry citizens of the State of Maryland, remonstrating against reductions in the compensation of Federal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented letters in the nature of memorials from sundry citizens of the State of Maryland, remonstrating against various features of the so-called economy section of House bill 11267, the legislative appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Tricounty Rural Letter Carriers Association, Chestertown, Md., composed of carriers of Cecil, Kent, and Queen Annes Counties, remonstrating against proposed cuts in appropriations for the Post Office Department, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from Jacob France and G. P. Bagby, president of the Western Maryland Railway Co., both of Baltimore, Md., remonstrating against the imposition of a tax of 4 cents per gallon upon lubricating oils, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a telegram and letter in the nature of memorials from citizens of the State of Maryland, remonstrating against increase in the rates on first and second class mail matter, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a telegram from J. Carroll Sullivan, of Baltimore, and a letter from Local No. 258, International Alliance Theatrical Stage Employees, of Cumberland, both in the State of Maryland, remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on admissions to amusements, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BINGHAM presented a petition of sundry citizens of Sterling, Moosup, and Oneco, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for reductions in the compensation of Federal employees and the elimination of duplicating activities, bureaus, positions, and functions in the Federal service that are not in accord with strict economy, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Riverside Association, of Riverside, Conn., favoring immediate and substantial reductions in Federal expenditures rather than increased pension and bonus legislation, and the adoption of a revenue measure that "will produce adequate revenues through the contribution of all without unduly burdening special interests and industries," which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented numerous petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Connecticut, favoring the passage of the veterans' bonus legislation, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Hartford District Council, Department of Connecticut, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, at Manchester, Conn., opposing any reduction in pension or compensation of veterans, widows, or orphans of all wars, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the senior department and young people of the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church School, of New Britain; the branch of the American Association of University Women of New London; the section of the National Council of Jewish Women of Bozrahville; the women's organizations of Holy Trinity Church, of Middletown; and the New Haven Section, Council of Jewish Women, and the Men's Club of the United Church, both of New Haven, all in the State of Connecticut, favoring the prompt ratification of the World Court protocols, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Lady Fowler Council, No. 58, of Milford, and Star Council, No. 42, of Greenwich, both of the Sons and Daughters of Liberty, in the State of Connecticut, favoring the immediate passage of legislation providing for the exclusion and expulsion of alien communists, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Meriden, Conn., opposing the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution to the States, and favoring the making of adequate appropriations for law enforcement and education in law observance, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by groups of the Polish National Alliance of Bristol, Willimantic, Bridgeport, Middletown, Manchester, Wallingford, New Haven, Moosup, Hartford, Southington, Stamford, Ansonia, Jewett City, Rockville, Wallingford; the Polish American Progressive Citizens' Club, of New London; and the Tadeusz Kosciuszko Society, of Norwich, all in the State of Connecticut, favoring the passage of legislation proclaiming October 11 in each year as General Pulaski's Memorial Day, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against the passage of legislation providing for the closing of barber shops on Sunday in the District of Columbia, or other restrictive religious measures, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Ridgefield, Conn., remonstrating against the imposition of a tax of 1 cent a shell on shotgun shells, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Fish and Game League of Southwestern Connecticut, favoring the passage of legislation to afford additional protection to the grizzly and brown bears of Alaska, and the setting aside of Admiralty Island, Alaska, as a bear sanctuary, so that these mammals may be preserved for posterity, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

VETERANS' AFFAIRS AND LEGISLATION

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD and have referred to the proper committee a letter I have just received from an official of the American Legion in my State, formerly State commander of the American Legion of Minnesota.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF MINNESOTA,
THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Ortonville, Minn., May 17, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Legionnaires all over this State and all over the country are primarily interested in three things which are now before the United States Senate, namely:

1. Passage of the Steiwer-Rankin widows' and orphans' bill with the needs clause eliminated.

2. Passage of the Brookhart resolution for the Senate veterans' committee.

3. Opposition to the inclusion in the Senate economy program of any reductions of benefits to the disabled.

I wish to call your attention to the fact that the widows and orphans of the Civil and Spanish-American Wars have been taken care of, but nothing has been done to take care of the widows and orphans of the non-service-connected cases of the World War. If this bill is not passed real soon, it will be too late to preserve the home in many cases, and these children will have to be sent to orphan asylums or placed in other homes.

We of the Legion do not feel that the House has shown very good faith in placing a needs clause in this piece of legislation, when in the same session they have voted $10,000 apiece to each of the widows of the 13 Congressmen who died during this session without making any inquiry as to whether they were rich or poor or whether they paid an income tax last year or whether they might pay one this year.

We are also especially interested in the passage of the Brookhart resolution for the Senate veterans' committee, because we feel this is the only way we can obtain a proper hearing before the Senate. Surely we are entitled to that much, at least.

We also stand solidly opposed to the inclusion in the Senate economy program of any reductions of benefits to the disabled. If there are any corrections to be made in veterans' legislation, it should be done after a full hearing and not attempted to be rushed through in a session such as this without giving the men who are entitled to every care and gratitude of a grateful Nation an opportunity to be heard.

Please understand that there has never been any doubt in my mind as to your attitude on any of these three questions for the reason that you have always given consideration to veterans' affairs and legislation, and I sincerely hope that we may count upon you to do everything you can for the carrying out of the three projects which we are most interested in during this present session.

Yours respectfully,

E. V. CLIFF,
National Executive Committeeman.

AGRICULTURE AND THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, also I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter addressed to the editor of the Minneapolis Tribune from a man who acts as agent for the Prudential Insurance Co. of America in making loans to farmers.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AGRICULTURE AND THE PHILIPPINES

To the EDITOR OF THE TRIBUNE:

Every voter in the United States should read your editorial, Tax Tropical Oils, in the Tribune, Monday morning, April 18. Every word in this article hits the bull's-eye.

Think of us importing from the Philippines annually 600,000,000 pounds of vegetable oils, duty free, produced by cheap oriental labor in direct competition with our own high-grade American life, owning and operating our farms, and deliberately strangling and impoverishing the best customer the United States has for the production of its industrial life. Why is this? Are we as a people under a legal or moral obligation to crucify ourselves in order to provide a job for this oriental life on the other side of the world? Have not the taxpayers of the United States in every way done their full paternal duty to the Philippines, the control of which we acquired without design or desire on our part?

We as a nation have only one further duty to perform, which is to grant that people their full and complete independence. Are we holding on to them at the expense of our farmers and our whole national interests because our leaders in finance found their country a highly profitable field for the investment of a hundred million dollars, more or less, of American capital which they now feel may suffer some risk if the Philippine nation is allowed its God-given right to govern itself?

We should have at once a stiff tariff on all vegetable oils or raw materials that come in and are used by us, thereby crippling our great dairy and meat-producing business. Early in our national life we had political and economic brains big enough to realize that protective-tariff walls shutting out the outside world's cheap-labor products, making the United States a self-contained nation in a large way was a sound principle for us. It is true that we violated that so-called sacred law of supply and demand which our economic poets keep singing about. But it has worked. We made an economic law of our own and are rightfully proud and glad about it.

We know that while our protectitve-tariff walls have created our many great billion-dollar manufacturing and other trusts, they have also been the direct cause of the elevation of the life of our industrial and working masses from what would have been a condition of semipeonage to that higher plane necessary to play the part of American citizenship.

About 12 years ago we were guilty of a great national blunder, the penalty for which has not yet been paid. We willfully overlooked the fact that the economic convulsion affecting the whole world resulting from the World War left our great basic industry, agriculture, in a defenseless position. Steps should have been immediately taken then to provide for our farmer the addition of a proper tariff protection to the price received by him for all of his products that would be consumed by our own people. If he happened to have a surplus above home requirements to sell to the outside world, he could then take the outside-world price for it, let it be ever so small, and still keep solvent and going and be a large consumer of the productions of the rest of us.

The addition of the tariff protection to the price received by our farmer on all of his products consumed at home would add but a very small fraction to the living costs of our urban and industrial life. Our whole country is at this time thoroughly alive to the fact that our consumer class pays about the same price for his baker's loaf of bread—let wheat be 50 cents or $1.50 a bushel to the man who grows the grain. If there should be a small increase to the consumer class in the cost of living, it would be many times offset by our farmer being placed in a solvent, free-consuming condition and the placing of millions of our present jobless people back on the pay roll.

Our farmer to-day is selling his production for about one-half of the previous 10-year average price, and his outgo in taxes, interest, and for everything he has to buy is but a little below the average of 10 years past. If this continues, his survival as an independent citizen is an impossibility. It is not yet too late to correct our great national mistake. There is contained in the principle of the equalization fee and proper tariff walls the key to the solution of this real national menace which we are facing. Why not use it or any other equally effective democratic plan that will accomplish the same end. Our farmer must be in the same favored place when he sells a load of meat or grain as our aluminum or steel citizen enjoys when he sells a ton of his product.

GEORGE E. TOWLE, Minneapolis.

TARIFF ON LUMBER

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, also I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an editorial from the Minneapolis Journal dealing with a tariff on lumber.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Minneapolis Journal, Monday, May 16, 1932]

THE LUMBER TARIFF GRAB

Of the four tariff grabs forced into the revenue bill by skilled logrollers, by far the most unconscionable is the proposed duty of $3 a thousand feet on lumber imports.

This lumber tariff, if left in the law, will imperil the St. Lawrence seaway, will further cut American pay rolls, and will trebly damage American agriculture.

The farmer will suffer under needlessly higher lumber prices. The farmer will suffer through delay or abandonment of the seaway project. The farmer will suffer through the further narrowing of the domestic market for the foodstuffs he produces.

With tariff barriers already erected, and rightly, against cheap Canadian farm products, Canada is left with lumber as the principal exportable commodity with which she can pay for goods purchased in the United States. If we now bar out her lumber, we shall force the further movement of American factories across the Detroit River. Already there have been invested in the Windsor area some hundred and fifty millions of American dollars, with a proportionate creation of Canadian pay rolls at the cost of abandoned American pay rolls.

To the American farmer it makes mighty little difference whether workers employed in these factories are Canadians or transplanted Americans. The fact remains that, dwelling outside the United States and making goods for Canadians inside the Canadian industrial tariff wall and outside the American agricultural tariff wall, they eat Canadian flour, butter, meat, cheese, milk, and vegetables. They wear Canadian or other British textiles. The paint on the walls of their homes is mixed in Canadian linseed oil. Their needs affect the American farmer's market little more than would be the case if they lived and worked in Australia.

So much for one rather certain result of a $3 American-lumber tariff—Canadian retaliation in the form of industrial rates that would force still more factories across the line.

Another rather certain Canadian reprisal against the proposed high lumber tariff would be reluctance, and quite possibly flat refusal, to join with the United States in the development of the St. Lawrence seaway. Failure to build the seaway would directly affect the price of every bushel of grain grown in the Northwest, for the lower the cost of shipment to Liverpool, the higher the value of the grain at the country elevator, whether destined for the world market or for domestic consumption.

For every job created in the forests of the Pacific Northwest by the proposed lumber rate, two or more workingmen in the industrial centers of America would be thrown out of employment. Add to this the abandonment of the St. Lawrence seaway project, with its promise of work for an army of laborers, and it will be seen that, as a measure for stimulating employment, the $3 lumber tariff would be worse than a failure.

Equally indefensible is this proposal as a revenue measure. The Hawley-Smoot rate of a dollar a thousand feet on dressed softwood lumber, with rough lumber coming in free, already has cut in half the volume of imports from Canada. To treble this rate and include all softwood lumber would eliminate these imports altogether. Revenue from customs collections would be decreased rather than increased.

There is no justification for the $3 lumber rate as a revenue measure. There is no justification for the $3 lumber rate even as a protective measure, in the opinion of the Tariff Commission, based on an exhaustive study of the situation. And, even if there were a need for this tariff as a protective measure, why slide lumber into the revenue bill and leave out vegetable oils, commodities whose importation robs the American farmer of part of his butter market?

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 4318) for the relief of Horace G. Knowles, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 723) thereon.

Mr. McNARY, from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, to which was referred the bill (S. 4614) to amend section 14 of an act entitled "An act to adjust water-right charges, to grant certain other relief on the Federal irrigation projects, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1926 (44 Stat. 636), as amended (46 Stat. 249), reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 724) thereon.

Mr. VANDENBERG, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4644) to extend the time for construction of a free highway bridge across the Sabine River where Louisiana Highway No. 21 meets Texas Highway No. 45, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 725) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 4645) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Sabine River where Louisiana Highway No. 6 meets Texas Highway No. 21, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 726) thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

Mr. VANDENBERG (for Mr. WATERMAN), from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on the 19th instant that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

S. 1335. An act to remove the limitations upon the filling of a vacancy of district judge for the district of New Jersey; and

S. 2498. An act to authorize the transfer of jurisdiction over public land in the District of Columbia.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CUTTING:

A bill (S. 4710) to amend the act approved February 25, 1920, entitled "An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain"; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 4711) for the relief of Edward Xavier Linck; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 4712) authorizing the sale of certain lands no longer required for public purposes in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 4713) to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to reopen, rehear, and redetermine the claim of A. W. Duckett & Co. (Inc.); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 4714) granting a pension to Frederick Platten; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 4715) to authorize the transfer to the Department of Agriculture of portions of the Fort De Soto Military Reservation, Fla., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WHEELER:

A bill (S. 4716) granting a pension to Jens A. Jepsen (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 4717) to provide for expenses of the Northern Cheyenne Indian Tribal Council and authorized delegates of the tribe; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. KING:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 162) authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make advances for the prosecution of reclamation projects in the State of Utah; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

REVENUE AND TAXATION—AMENDMENTS

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. METCALF each submitted an amendment and Mr. TYDINGS submitted 504 amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to House bill 10236, the revenue and taxation bill, which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

INVESTIGATION OF LOBBYING ACTIVITIES

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, several charges have been made on the floor of the Senate with reference to the existence of a lobby here in Washington. Likewise, a charge was made recently by President Hoover to the effect that a swarm of lobbyists were haunting the Halls of Congress. Likewise, charges were made by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and by the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] with reference to lobbyists.

I ask unanimous consent, out of order, for leave to introduce at this time a resolution for an investigation of these charges of lobbying, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DILL in the chair). Without objection, the resolution will be received and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The resolution (S. Res. 215) is as follows:

Whereas on May 6, 1932, President Hoover in a statement to the press stated, "It is also an issue between the people and the locust swarm of lobbyists who haunt the Halls of Congress seeking selfish privilege for special groups and sections of the country, misleading Members as to the real views of the people by showers of propaganda"; and

Whereas on May 5, 1932, Senator DAVID A. REED stated, "Such a cloud of lobbyists descended upon the House, so strong was the pressure of the soldier lobby that only about 25 per cent of the membership of the House dared to vote in favor of that obviously just suggestion. The more specific the act the stronger will be the lobby, and, apparently at the other end of the Capitol, anyway, there was not courage enough to resist it"; and

Whereas on May 6, 1932, Senator GERALD P. NYE made the following statement: "The weekly radio broadcasts by the spokesmen and errand boys for big business and concentrated wealth have brought to each Senator's desk during the winter letters upon letters protesting against Government expenditures and demanding economy and tax reduction. These spokesmen, for selfishness and greed, have done their work so well that many people have been blinded to their local, county, and State tax responsibilities under which they labor, and have been tempted to believe that their terrible tax burden was occasioned quite alone by expenditures of the Federal Government"; and

Whereas Hon. PETER NORBECK on May 11, 1932, made the following statement: "Misstatements were made galore by lobbyists—misstatements that have been sent out of here because the lobbyists have to maintain their offices also. They have to cry 'wolf' once in a while if they are going to continue to draw their salaries, so they sent out warnings galore against the Glass bill and against this and that section of the Glass bill and against the minority of the committee and against the 'wild jackasses' on the committee"; and

Whereas Hon. F. I. LAGUARDIA on May 7 made the following statement: "To-day the President in his statement to the public refers 'to a swarm of lobbyists like locusts who haunt the Halls of Congress.' The lobbies of the House Office Building and Capitol were never so crowded with admirals and generals who appeared here in opposition to consolidation of the Army and Navy. I submit to the President that if he wishes to stop lobbying, here is one of the group of minorities that he can immediately stop. As Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy he needs no legislation to stop this class. He can issue an order and tell his admirals and generals and his military and naval lobbyists to keep away from the Congress and let us legislate. And, talking about lobbyists, do you remember during the discussion of the tax bill, when we placed a tax on stock transfers, the pressure that was brought to bear on us? Do you remember the abuse that we got because we opposed the sales tax? Is it not an unfortunate synchronization when, on the next day after the President makes his appeal to keep lobbyists away from Washington, the lobbyists and the special interests had already done their dirty work in emasculating the tax on the other side of the Capitol"; and

Whereas again on March 17, 1932, Hon. DAVID A. REED made the following statement: "There are, I am ashamed to say, a lot of Americans who get asked to lunch by a countess and immediately break into tears and cancel the debt. There are a lot of Americans who, for some reason of their own, have taken this foreign propaganda as if it were the Bible. I have wandered from the subject upon which I first rose to speak; but I think there is a certain value in the reiteration of the statement that that propaganda is not successful with all Americans"; and

Whereas various other statements have been made in the public press and on the floor of Congress with reference to lobbyists invading our National Capitol and influencing legislation: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed (1) to investigate into the activities of lobbying associations and lobbyists and into the charges made by the President of the United States and by various Members of Congress, to the effect that a swarm of lobbyists are haunting the Halls of Congress, causing delays and seeking selfish special privilege for special groups and sections of the country, and (2) to report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of such investigation and, if in its judgment such practice should be prohibited, to submit with such report its recommendations for the necessary remedial legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the first session of the Seventy-second Congress, to employ such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths and to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $———, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11897) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BISCAYNE BAY—IMPROVEMENT OF CHANNEL FROM CAPE FLORIDA TO MIAMI, FLA. (S. DOC. NO. 95)

On motion of Mr. FLETCHER, a letter from the Chief of Engineers of the Army, addressed to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, relative to reports on Biscayne Bay, Fla., submitted in House Document No. 295, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session, and House Document No. 662, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, in the matter of determining whether any improvement of the channel from Cape Florida to Miami is deemed advisable at the present time, with an accompanying report of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors on the subject, was ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 11897) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE resumed and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. The speech follows entire.

Thursday, May 19, 1932

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss in detail the four tariff items contained in the pending revenue bill. I wish, however, to make an appeal, which however futile it may be is none the less sincere, to Members of this body on both sides of the aisle. I now make publicly the appeal which at the inception of the hearings on this bill I made in private to leaders on both sides of this Chamber. My appeal is that these tariff items be eliminated from this bill, because, in my judgment, unless that course of action is taken interminable delay will be the inevitable result.

I have no doubt, Mr. President, that the tariff items in this bill consumed 30 per cent of the time given by the committee to the consideration of this measure. We now are fully aware of the situation that confronts us if any or all of these tariff items are to be included in this bill as reported by the committee. We now know that before this measure shall pass the Senate and go to conference not only will a great many amendments be offered to the rates in the existing tariff law but they will be debated and pressed for consideration. Also, I have been advised to-day that a Senator has under consideration offering the export debenture amendment to this bill if the tariff items are to be included in it.

I do not view these amendments as parliamentary maneuvering for advantage. I believe they are the logical outcome of permitting any one, or all four, of these tariff items to be included in the bill. It is but natural, if this measure is opened up for revision of any tariff rates, that Senators representing various sections of the country in which other interests are located, all caught up in this cataclysmic economic disaster, should find themselves under pressure to secure what I believe to be but an illusory advantage by seeking to amend the tariff law.

In the committee, Mr. President, as has been so well said by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], we marched up the hill and down again many times on these tariff items. However, it is perfectly obvious what occurred in the committee was only a curtain raiser to what will take place in this body if these tariff items are forced into this bill.

Some Senators may discount the amendments which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] proposes to offer. Others may not take seriously the statement that the export debenture will be offered as an amendment to this bill; but I, for one, am firmly convinced that the Senate must decide on the initial vote on oil whether it chooses to pass a tax bill in a reasonable length of time, or whether it proposes to stay here for weeks revising the tariff.

I made that statement when the committee first took up the consideration of this bill, when I appealed to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], and other conservative Senators on this side of the Chamber to exercise their leadership and their influence in persuading the Finance Committee to take what seemed to me the only logical and the only safe ground for it to take in this emergency. I stated to them then, and I state to the Senate now, that it is perfectly obvious we shall ultimately be confronted with a general revision of the tariff unless all these items are eliminated from the bill.

I have not been one of those, in this Chamber or out of it, who have lent themselves to the campaign to convince the people and the Congress that immediate balancing of the Federal Budget is imperative. I have not subscribed to the statement made by one member of the Finance Committee when we first met that it would be better to pass a bad tax bill in a few days than to pass a good one in two or three weeks. But no man in this Chamber can doubt the fact that the people of this country have been convinced that the speedy enactment of a bill which is alleged to balance the Budget is necessary in order to preserve the financial structure of this Government and its banking institutions; and I wish to say in all sincerity, in view of that situation, that the Senators who are working to force these tariffs into the pending bill assume in the public mind a grave responsibility.

Naturally, if one of these items—and the first one happens to be oil—goes into this bill, the bars are down. Every Senator will feel free to make—will perhaps feel under the necessity of making—a fight in behalf of tariffs for industries in his State or section. As one Senator said to me in the Finance Committee when this question first came up, "If any of these tariff items go into this bill, how am I ever going to be able to go home and justify to my constituents my failure to secure adjustments of tariffs in which they are interested?"

For the reasons which I have suggested, when the Finance Committee first met I offered a resolution declaring it to be the sense of the committee that all tariff items should be eliminated from this bill. In taking this action I was not passing upon the merits of the two tariff items that were then in the bill, nor was I attempting to pass on the other tariff items which had been discussed as probable subjects of legislative action in connection with this revenue measure. What I sought to accomplish was an orderly consideration of the momentous questions involved in this revenue bill, and to exclude therefrom the confusion, the delay, and the logrolling which I knew would follow if the tariff items were included—not only log rolling in so far as the tariff items were concerned, but logrolling also on the momentous questions of public fiscal policy involved in the tax sections of this bill were concerned; and every Senator familiar with the situation knows what has taken place.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to say that there is one Senator here who has not logrolled in respect to any provision of this bill, and I want that distinctly understood. My brethren may rest under the imputation if they desire. I do not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, when the committee met on the 25th of April I offered a motion that all tariff items be eliminated from the bill and that the committee should give no consideration to tariff duties. The motion was defeated by the following vote:

Yeas, 9: KEYES, LA FOLLETTE, METCALF, HARRISON, GEORGE, WALSH of Massachusetts, BARKLEY, COSTIGAN, HULL.

Nays, 10: WATSON, REED, SHORTRIDGE, COUZENS, BINGHAM, THOMAS of Idaho, JONES, CONNALLY, GORE, and the chairman.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, on what question was that vote?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It was on the motion I offered that it should be the sense of the committee that all tariff items be eliminated from the bill.

There was some discussion this afternoon as to who should assume the responsibility for the inclusion of the tariff items in this bill. I submit that the statement I made that the majority of the votes for the tariff items in this bill were furnished by the Republicans sitting above me at the table is correct. It is demonstrated by the fact that we find, first of all, the chairman; next, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Republican leader; then the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]; then the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

We next voted on a motion to strike oil from the bill. It was lost by the following roll call:

Yeas, 8—KEYES, LA FOLLETTE, METCALF, HARRISON, GEORGE, WALSH of Massachusetts, COSTIGAN, and HULL.

Nays, 10—WATSON, REED, SHORTRIDGE, COUZENS, BINGHAM, THOMAS of Idaho, JONES, CONNALLY, GORE, and the chairman.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. Since the curtain is being raised upon what took place in the executive sessions of the committee, will the Senator say who made the motion upon which that vote was taken?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am not raising the curtain. These roll calls were all given to the press by the chairman. I simply want to put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, before we vote upon this first tariff duty, the record of the committee.

I am sorry to say that the minutes of the committee do not show who made the motion.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. There was a general understanding that it was not necessary to make a motion on the part of anybody; that we would have roll calls on those various items without any particular Member offering a motion to that effect.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I may say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the minutes show that—

The committee then proceeded to vote on each of the tariff items in the House bill, and on other proposed tariff items, the vote on each being as follows.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator from Wisconsin stated on the first vote that he had made the motion; and I wondered if the minutes showed who made the motions on all the various items.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator from Wisconsin note that I desire this information from his point of view:

Suppose the motion made to strike these particular features—oil, coal, lumber, and copper—from the bill, on the ground that they are tariff items, had been sustained, what, then, would there be in the way of an obstruction for Senators representing these interests to tender them in separate amendments to the bill just as they stand, either with the clause stricken out or otherwise?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator means after the bill was reported to the Senate?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir. While the bill is in the Senate, if the various items to which the able Senator refers as tariff items had been stricken out on the theory that, being tariff articles, they ought not to attach themselves to the bill, would there be anything to prevent, then, the advocate of each one of these items tendering it to the Senate as a separate amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Illinois is too experienced a legislator to ask that question. Obviously, it was in order for any Senator to offer any amendment to any section of the tariff bill in connection with this matter after it came on the floor. If the committee had voted to eliminate these items from the bill, such recommendation would have had an important effect upon the Senate; that is, had the committee reported that it felt the urgency of the situation was such that the time which inevitably would be consumed in the consideration of these tariff items should not be taken in connection with an emergency revenue bill.

Mr. LEWIS. I take it, then, that the Senator assumed that if such a motion could be made and carried as coming from the committee, it would have more weight with the Senate than if made by an individual Member?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I assume that if the committee had recommended that these items be stricken out, and had pointed out to the Senate the reasons for not taking up the time in connection with the tariff, it would have had a great deal of weight; and, as everybody knows, the vote on this oil item is so close that if we had the leadership on this side of the aisle exerting itself in favor of the elimination of all these tariff items from the bill there can be no question but that they would be eliminated.

The next vote, Mr. President, came on the question of striking coal from the bill.

The yeas were Senators KEYES, LA FOLLETTE, METCALF, HARRISON, GEORGE, WALSH of Massachusetts, COSTIGAN, and HULL.

The nays were Senators WATSON, REED, SHORTRIDGE, COUZENS, BINGHAM, THOMAS of Idaho, JONES, CONNALLY, GORE, and the chairman.

The motion was then made to put a duty on copper and proper compensatories. Those voting in favor of that motion were Senators WATSON, REED, SHORTRIDGE, COUZENS, BINGHAM, THOMAS of Idaho, JONES, METCALF, CONNALLY, and the chairman.

Those voting in the negative were Senators KEYES, LA FOLLETTE, HARRISON, GEORGE, WALSH of Massachusetts, BARKLEY, COSTIGAN, and HULL. The motion carried, 10 to 8.

On Friday, April 29, the question again came up in the committee, and Senator WALSH of Massachusetts moved to strike the tariff on oil from the bill. The motion carried by the following vote:

Yeas—Senators COUZENS, KEYES, LA FOLLETTE, METCALF, HARRISON, KING, GEORGE, WALSH of Massachusetts, COSTIGAN, and HULL.

Nays—Senators WATSON, REED, SHORTRIDGE, BINGHAM, THOMAS of Idaho, JONES, CONNALLY, GORE, and the chairman.

Next, a motion was made by Senator HARRISON that the tariff on coal be reduced from 10 cents to 5 cents. The motion was lost. Senator HARRISON moved that the tariff on coal be stricken from the bill. The motion was carried by the following vote:

Yeas—Senators COUZENS, KEYES, LA FOLLETTE, HARRISON, KING, GEORGE, WALSH of Massachusetts, BARKLEY, COSTIGAN, and HULL.

Nays—Senators WATSON, REED, SHORTRIDGE, BINGHAM, THOMAS of Idaho, JONES, METCALF, CONNALLY, and the chairman.

A motion was then made to adopt a tariff on copper. The result was a tie.

Yeas—Senators WATSON, SHORTRIDGE, COUZENS, BINGHAM, THOMAS of Idaho, JONES, METCALF, KING, CONNALLY, and the chairman.

Nays—Senators REED, KEYES, LA FOLLETTE, HARRISON, GEORGE, WALSH of Massachusetts, BARKLEY, GORE, COSTIGAN, and HULL.

The motion was lost, the vote being a tie.

There was another vote on the tariff matters in this bill. On Wednesday, May 4, Senator JONES moved that a rate of $3 per thousand be imposed on lumber imports. The motion carried by a vote as follows:

Yeas—Senators WATSON, REED, SHORTRIDGE, COUZENS, KEYES, BINGHAM, THOMAS of Idaho, JONES, METCALF, CONNALLY, and the chairman.

Nays—Senators LA FOLLETTE, HARRISON, KING, GEORGE, WALSH of Massachusetts, BARKLEY, COSTIGAN, and HULL.

Senator SMOOT, the chairman of the committee, moved that a tariff be placed on coal. The motion was carried.

Yeas—Senators WATSON, REED, SHORTRIDGE, BINGHAM, THOMAS of Idaho, JONES, METCALF, BARKLEY, CONNALLY, GORE, and the chairman.

Nays—Senators COUZENS, LA FOLLETTE, HARRISON, KING, GEORGE, WALSH of Massachusetts, COSTIGAN, and HULL.

Then began the long and tortuous course of the proposed duty on oil. I shall not read all of these roll calls. There were a number of them. They started with a vote on oil imports moved by Senator SHORTRIDGE. Senator CONNALLY moved that the duty on crude oil be 1 cent, on fuel 1¼ cents, and on gasoline 3 cents. The motion was lost, as follows:

Yeas—Senators WATSON, REED, SHORTRIDGE, BINGHAM, THOMAS of Idaho, JONES, CONNALLY, GORE, and the chairman.

Nays—Senators COUZENS, KEYES, LA FOLLETTE, METCALF, HARRISON, KING, GEORGE, WALSH of Massachusetts, COSTIGAN, and HULL.

The motion lost, 9 to 10. Senator SHORTRIDGE moved that the rate on oil imports be nine-tenths of a cent on crude, 1 cent on fuel, and 2½ cents on gasoline. The motion was lost by the same vote as that I have just read.

Senator CONNALLY then moved that the rate on oil imports be 1 cent on crude, one-half cent on fuel—it will be seen that he dropped to one-half cent on fuel—and to 2½ cents on gasoline instead of 3 cents. But even that did not put oil across.

The vote was: Yeas—Senators WATSON, SHORTRIDGE, BINGHAM, THOMAS of Idaho, JONES, METCALF, CONNALLY, GORE, and SMOOT.

Nays—Senators REED, COUZENS, KEYES, LA FOLLETTE, HARRISON, KING, GEORGE, WALSH of Massachusetts, COSTIGAN, and HULL.

Senator CONNALLY moved that the 3-cent rate on gasoline imports be adopted, and that was lost by the same vote as the one which was cast just before that, 9 to 10.

The yeas were—Senators WATSON, REED, SHORTRIDGE, BINGHAM, THOMAS of Idaho, JONES, CONNALLY, GORE, and SMOOT.

The nays were—Senators COUZENS, KEYES, LA FOLLETTE, METCALF, HARRISON, KING, GEORGE, WALSH of Massachusetts, COSTIGAN, and HULL.

Senator CONNALLY persisted, however. He then moved that the rate be one-half cent on crude and fuel oil, 2½ cents on gasoline, and 4 cents on lubricating oil, 1 cent a pound on paraffin, and 10 cents a hundred pounds on asphalt. It will be seen that to get the votes to put this over he had reduced his duty on crude from 1 cent to half a cent, leaving the same duties on gasoline and the other commodities. The vote on that motion was:

Yeas—Senators WATSON, REED, SHORTRIDGE, BINGHAM, THOMAS of Idaho, JONES, METCALF, CONNALLY, GORE, and SMOOT.

It will be observed that Senator METCALF changed his vote on that motion.

The nays were—Senators COUZENS, KEYES, LA FOLLETTE, HARRISON, KING, GEORGE, WALSH of Massachusetts, COSTIGAN, and HULL.

My only purpose in putting these votes in the RECORD is to demonstrate, first of all, that the committee was very evenly divided upon this question, and that the judgment of one or two members of the committee changed, in this case, on several occasions. I am satisfied in my own mind that a majority of the committee was convinced, after we had eliminated four tariff items from the bill, that we had taken a step which would facilitate the passage of the revenue bill and would do much to prevent long delay in the Senate.

So far as this duty on oil is concerned, I wish to say at the outset that I am not hardened against the appeals which have been made by representatives of the independents—or so-called independents—in the oil industry.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. Before the Senator goes into that, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will be glad to answer if I can.

Mr. GLASS. Why were tariff proposals confined to these four particular items? Did not shingles, or wood pulp, or manganese, or dozens of other items, have any friend at court at all?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Lumber had a rather difficult time getting into this close corporation, and I think they dropped shingles and logs and were delighted to slide in with $3 on lumber. However, in so far as other items are concerned, I can only answer the Senator's question by saying that while I am not in the confidence of Senators who have been managing the fights for these different tariffs, my distinct impression, from observing the gyrations of members of the Finance Committee, is that they finally adopted the slogan of the Three Musketeers, "All for one and one for all." In other words, they decided apparently to get these four items into the bill and then to remain adamant against the inclusion of any others.

I can only come to that conclusion in view of the sad fate of the attempt on the part of the Senator from California to get a duty on manganese, even though he succeeded in getting the support of the Assistant Secretary of War for that proposal.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. These four items which are in this tax bill are items on raw materials which the agricultural interests of the country will have to pay for. Can the Senator enlighten us as to whether there was any concern expressed for any tariffs on any agricultural items?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My recollection is that a Representative from South Dakota appeared and appealed to the committee to increase the tariff on butter, but it apparently got pretty badly jammed in between these heavy raw materials. It had no support from the raw-material tariff advocates.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The Senator was mentioning the proposition of butter. Did the Senator support the increase in the tariff rate on casein? I notice that in the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill the House of Representatives fixed a rate of 2½ cents a pound, and the Finance Committee of the Senate fixed the rate at 3½ cents a pound; that Senator BLAINE offered an amendment, which the RECORD shows the senior Senator from Wisconsin voted for, raising the rate to 5½ cents a pound. I just wanted to know whether that met with the Senator's views on the tariff question as to that product of Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I say to the Senator that there was a long discussion on casein, which I do not want to go into just now. The Senator from California wanted to make the rate very much higher than what it was, and I came to the conclusion, after listening to the arguments, that the duty proposed by my colleague fairly represented the difference in cost of production between the United States and the Argentine.

Mr. LONG. That is just what I was wondering, whether the Senator, having concluded that it was a fair representation of the difference in the cost of production in Wisconsin and foreign countries and thought it was a patriotic act to give that product some consideration, why not give the oil of Louisiana that same treatment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I say further to the Senator from Louisiana he apparently has lost the entire import of my argument. I contend that this is not a proper time to inject into a debate on a revenue bill a general revision of the tariff.

Friday, May 20, 1932

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, when the Senate recessed last night I had just completed reading into the RECORD the roll call in the Finance Committee disclosing the shift in votes which was responsible, first, for eliminating the four tariff items from the bill; and, secondly, for rewriting them into the measure before it was reported to the Senate. It was demonstrated as a result of these roll calls that responsibility, in so far as the Finance Committee action is concerned, rests squarely upon the Republican members of that committee.

In the first resolution offered to eliminate the tariff, Republicans furnished 8 and Democrats 2 votes for the defeat of the resolution; Republicans furnished 3 votes and Democrats 5 in favor of it. The second time the resolution was voted on to eliminate the tariff, 7 Republicans and 2 Democrats voted against the resolution, while 4 Republicans and 6 Democrats voted for it.

In the course of my remarks last evening I had hoped to point out to the Senate that continuation of discussion of the tariff features of the revenue bill is inevitable, unless all four of the items in the bill as reported by the Finance Committee are eliminated. I am convinced of that fact not only because we now know that unless those four items are eliminated many other tariff items will be the subject of discussion, but also because, if the Senate includes in the bill any or all of those four items, that other interests concerned either in securing increases or decreases of other tariff rates will insist that the Senate has opened up the tariff question and will urge that action should be taken to give what they consider relief.

I shall not detain the Senate long in discussing the specific item under consideration. It has been very ably discussed on both sides and Senators have already determined what their course will be in regard to it. Nevertheless, I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to portions of the report made by the Manufactures Committee in 1923, after one of the most exhaustive and effective investigations ever made of the oil industry by a governmental body.

The Committee on Manufactures began its hearings on August 7, 1922, and rendered its report to the Senate on March 3, 1923. It retained as its counsel the late Gilbert E. Roe, of New York City, one of the ablest lawyers whom I have ever known. As a result of his splendid work, together with the work of the members of the committee, a mass of evidence was obtained and the committee's report, based upon that evidence, has never, in so far as I know, been successfully challenged. On page 3 of that report the committee said:

> The dominating fact in the oil industry to-day is its complete control by the Standard companies. Any discussion of the subject which does not frankly recognize this control can only be misleading. Standard Oil to-day fixes the price which the producer of crude oil receives at the well, the price which the refiner receives for his gasoline and kerosene, as well as the retail price paid by the consumer.

That statement is as true to-day as it was on the day when this committee rendered its report to the Senate.

The report goes on to say:

> The Standard Oil group divides among the members of that group all the territory of the United States, and, with slight exceptions to be presently noticed, avoids all competition with other members of the group in the business of retailing gasoline and kerosene. Not only this, but two of the leading Standard companies—New Jersey and New York—divide the world between themselves in retail marketing operations, and each carefully abstains from entering the territory of the other, while both refrain from competing with the Anglo-American Oil Co. (Ltd.) (one of the original Standard group) in the retail trade in the British Isles.
> Through the Standard control of the pipe lines connecting the producing centers of the West with the consuming centers of the East and Middle West not only is the price fixed according to the will of the Standard group which any other interest must pay for the transportation of petroleum but members of the group really determine whether any concern outside their group shall have petroleum transported at any price.
> The methods by which the Standard companies control the oil industry to-day are more subtle than those by which the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, through its subsidiaries, controlled it prior to the dissolution decree in 1911. But the results are the same. Whatever competition has existed between the Standard companies and the so-called independents since the decree of dissolution in 1911 has not been the result of that decree but has been the result of the discovery in the United States and Mexico of new oil fields, largely through adventurous independent operators, which fields, in many instances, as soon as proven, have by various methods been brought under the control of the Standard interests. When the time comes, as it is certain to come in the near future, that there are no more oil fields to discover and exploit in this country, this competition, such as it is, will necessarily disappear.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me if I interrupt him there?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will permit me to finish reading this paragraph, I will then yield to him.

Mr. LONG. I thought the Senator had finished.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I continue the quotation from the report:

> In the Supreme Court decision ordering the dissolution of the Standard Oil Trust (Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1), at page 42, the court, through Mr. Justice White, summarizes the averments of the bill of complaint. Among the principal allegations of the complaint which were found to be true by the court were—
> "restraint and monopolization by control of pipe lines, and unfair practices against competing pipe lines; contracts with competitors in restraint of trade; unfair methods of competition, such as local price cutting at the points where necessary to suppress competition."
> Also—
> "the division of the United States into districts and the limiting of the operations of the various subsidiary corporations as to such districts so that competition in the sale of petroleum products between such corporations had been entirely eliminated and destroyed; and finally reference was made to what was alleged to be the 'enormous and unreasonable profits' earned by the Standard Oil Trust and the Standard Oil Co. as a result of the alleged monopoly; * * *."

The report then says:

> A careful examination of the evidence taken in this investigation will show that in the respect of the above matters and others which led to the outlawing of the Standard Oil monopoly the same conditions exist as existed when the decree of the Supreme Court was entered, and that in some respects the industry as a whole, as well as the public, are more completely at the mercy of the Standard Oil interests now than they were when the decree of dissolution was entered in 1911. This point can not be too strongly emphasized, for the reason that the intolerable conditions in the oil industry which are established in this investigation can not be corrected while Standard Oil dominates the business as it does to-day.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me an interruption?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I am familiar with that investigation and report, because we were conducting a similar investigation at about the same time in the midst of the oil fields. The facts the Senator has read have been proved, in part, untrue, although the conclusions are entirely correct. The report states that the foreign discovery of oil was responsible for what the independent business was in the oil trade. It also says that those fields were being taken over as soon as discovered. The facts are that they were all taken over and there is no independent foreign oil ownership. That is No. 1.

No. 2. The statement in the report that we would not have any oil in this country after some 20 years has been proven untrue. A number of those years, about 10, have gone, and we have to-day the largest oil supply in the country that anyone ever dreamed of, and the only independent oil industry now in the world is in this area of America.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator is incorrect in his statement that this report finds that whatever competition existed was due to the discovery of oil in foreign fields. The report distinctly says that it was due to the discovery of oil in new domestic fields as well as in foreign fields. Again I say, Mr. President, that the assertion made in this report that the Standard Oil Co. and its subsidiaries dominate and control the oil industry is just as true to-day as it was when the report was made.

The contention has been made by the supporters of the proposed tariff on oil that the price of crude oil has no relation to the retail price of the commodities produced from it. It has been alleged, on the one hand, that this proposed tariff would benefit the so-called independent producers, because it would raise the price of crude oil. On the other hand, it is contended that the consumers of refined products would not be asked to pay an additional price, because the great monopoly which dominates this industry, according to the contention of the advocates of this amendment, would be so generous that it would absorb the additional price of crude oil and not pass it on to the consumer. The statement falls of its own weight. It has ever been the practice of monopoly to seize the opportunity to increase the price to the consumer, with or without justification.

On page 43 the report cites the testimony of Mr. Alfred S. Matthews, an oil jobber in Buffalo, N. Y., and at that time chairman of the New York State Petroleum Marketers' Association, from which I quote as follows:

"Q. In your experience in this business, did you find that there was any actual relation between the price of crude oil and of gasoline?—A. Any relation between the price of crude oil and the price of gasoline?

"Q. Yes.—A. What price do you mean of gasoline—the tank-car price or the tank-wagon price?

"Q. I mean either one. First, I had particularly in mind the tank-wagon price; but if you want to make the distinction between the two, do so.—A. Well, it would certainly seem that there must be a positive relation between the cost of crude and the cost of the manufacturing and the retail prices; but looking over a period of years, in New York at least, I must admit that very frequently conditions have existed which would make it almost impossible for anybody to tie up any relation whatever.

"Q. Will you illustrate what you mean by that or by a comparison of prices over a considerable period of time?—A. Well, of course, as you gentlemen know, the oil business is a very detail business and there are a good many interests involved. In looking over the whole industry in one view, it would rather appear that there are three interests in it, we will say—the producers, the refiners, and the marketer. I should say that there is always a profit in the oil business between the cost of the crude and the cost of the finished product as it goes to the consumer.

I should like to emphasize that, Mr. President:

"I should say that there is always a profit in the oil business between the cost of the crude and the cost of the finished product as it goes to the consumer. I believe there is always a sufficient profit between those two costs to make a reasonably remunerative business. The question is, Who gets it, and when? It seems to me that as to these three methods you might liken them to three men wrestling on a floor. There will be one time when the refiner is on top and the producer and the jobber are on the bottom. Then the tide will turn, and the producer will be on the top and the other fellows on the bottom; and then again the tide of combat will change, and the marketer will be on top and the other fellows below. There does not appear to be any actual regular course of events going along a natural line as to costs of manufacture and operation, etc. To illustrate that point, a few minutes ago you brought out some information here that showed the cost of crude in the mid-continent field in the summer of 1921 as being approximately $1 a barrel. Probably in other fields it would bring it up somewhat above that. The Pennsylvania has always been two or three times as expensive as the mid-continent. At that time we had a tank to market throughout New York State, which averaged, I would say, 27 cents. To-day the cost of crude would probably average somewhere in the neighborhood of $2 per barrel. We have a tank-wagon market in New York State of less than 22 cents.

"Q. That is, with the cost of crude, speaking generally, approximately almost double what it was at the time you mentioned, you have a tank-wagon price of somewhere about 21 cents?—A. The tank-wagon price, I think, accurately, is 21.80 cents. I believe that is right.

"Q. As against the tank-wagon price, the low price of 26 and 27 cents, when crude was lower?—A. Yes; the crude is double the tank wagon and the price is 5 or 7 cents cheaper."

Thomas S. Black, president of the Western Petroleum Co., who had been in the oil business for 20 years, testified that during the years 1917, 1918, 1919, and in 1920 his company had been virtually a purchasing agency for the Standard Oil of Indiana, although it acted as purchasing agent also for other Standard companies. Mr. Black had previously had many years' experience in the mid-continent field in connection with the operation of independent refineries in that field. Questioned by counsel for the committee, Mr. Black testified (record, p. 1245):

"Q. Mr. Black, were you ever told by the Standard Co. officials, during this time in your purchasing of gasoline and fuel oil and other products in the mid-continent field, that there was going to be an increase in the price of gasoline on a certain day in the future and to go out and purchase before that rise in price took place?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Were you told that more than once?—A. A great many times.

"Q. Was that the custom there to purchase, if it was a purchase, in anticipation of the rise in price, or did you purchase, generally speaking, upon information received from the Standard officials that there was to be a rise in price?—A. Not generally, Mr. Roe, because we were purchasing every day practically that we had information of any advance, almost every advance that took place, or decline.

"Q. How did you get it?—A. Well, they would call up, or I would go over to Doctor Burton (president of the Standard of Indiana) and he would give it to me, or Mr. Drake, when he lived, also.

"Q. How long in advance of the increase which was to be made or the decrease that was to be made in price would you receive this information?—A. Well, as far ahead as a week or 10 days.

"Q. That was the advance in the Standard tank-wagon price or the decrease?—A. Yes.

"Q. And then did the change in price always occur on the date which they had fixed for it to occur?—A. Always.

"Q. Did you receive any information from the Standard officials during this time as to changes in the crude-oil prices?—A. Occasionally.

"Q. The Standard of Indiana posted no prices in the mid-continent field, did it?—A. No, sir.

"Q. It was, however, a large purchaser of fuel oil, was it not?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And what relation did the price of fuel oil bear to the crude?—A. We bought fuel oil from the Standard Oil Co. on the basis of 75 cents for the crude, as posted by the Prairie Oil & Gas Co. in most instances, and it advanced or declined with the posted price of crude.

"Q. So that if the price of crude was going up a week hence or a few days hence, did that mean that on and after that day the prices that the Standard would pay for fuel oil would go up also?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you say you received information from the Standard Oil officials some days in advance on several occasions of the proposed increase of price?—A. I recall occasions of having received that information; yes, sir.

"Q. From whom did you receive it?—A. Doctor Burton.

"Q. Would this information come to you in memoranda or not?—A. Not.

"The CHAIRMAN. It would come to you, then, verbally, I take it?

"A. Always. They would either call me up to come over there, or invariably they called me up, because I did business with the Standard Oil Co. on account of the relationship of Hughes to Doctor Burton.

"Q. Did the practice continue so long as the Western Petroleum Co. was actually purchasing in the mid-continent field and selling to the Standard interests?—A. Yes; I think so."

The Standard Oil Co. of Indiana knew in advance of the time when crude oil was going to be raised in the mid-continent field by the Prairie Oil & Gas Co., even though the Standard Oil Co. was not a purchaser of crude oil in that field at the time. Possessing this advance information as to manipulation of the price either up or down, they passed it on to this company that was purchasing oil in order that they might take advantage of either the rise or the decline that had been predetermined for crude oil.

I continue to read from the report:

While the Standard of Indiana appeared and denied this testimony of Mr. Black, its denials were not persuasive.

The testimony of Mr. Black is strongly corroborated by that of his brother, W. C. Black, by R. A. Whitehead, former sales manager of fuel oils in the company of which Mr. Black was president, and there is no reasonable doubt that the practices testified to by Mr. Black existed.

It is conclusively established from all the evidence in this proceeding that the Standard companies make the retail prices of gasoline and kerosene throughout the country. Each Standard company is usually powerful enough to fix the price in its particular territory, but it is assured of the aid of the other companies of the Standard group whenever that aid is necessary. It is also a practice established by the Standard companies that when the price of crude oil goes up gasoline prices very promptly accompany it.

This is an important point in the consideration of the amendment. I repeat:

It is also a practice established by the Standard companies that when the price of crude oil goes up gasoline prices very promptly accompany it. When the price of crude goes down, however, gasoline prices lag behind.

What other practice could we expect from a monopoly which dominates this industry from the moment a gallon of crude oil leaves the well until its refined product is pumped into the tanks of the consumers in every hamlet, city, or town in the United States?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Not only that, may I point out to the Senator; not only do they dominate the field as to which the Senator has read, but, in addition, they own 51 per cent of the actual production. So that they have over half the production already, from the start to the finish, in their own hands, and the distributing centers and the media for all that they buy as well.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank the Senator for his suggestion.

The rule which applies almost universally wherever a tank-wagon price change follows a crude-oil price was thus developed from Mr. Wilkinson, of the Standard Oil of New York, on his examination respecting the table of prices submitted to the committee.

"Q. In other words, the price of gasoline did not go down as much with the decrease in the price of crude from $3.50 to $1 as it went up on the increase of price of crude from $2.75 to $3.50; is that not a fact?—A. The advance according to my tabulation from January, 1920, to January, 1921, was a little over 5½ cents per gallon. The drop from January, 1921, to June, 1921, was almost 6 cents per gallon—5.98, to be exact.

"Q. You are speaking of gasoline?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. But the corresponding change in the price of crude represented by the first increase in the price of gasoline of which you spoke was 75 cents a barrel, while the decrease in the price, reflected in the figures in the price of gasoline, according to the figures you give, was $3.50 a barrel to $1 a barrel?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Or the decrease in the price of crude was more than three times the increase, while the change in the price of gasoline was about the same; that is the fact, is it?—A. Yes, sir."

The facts established in this investigation respecting the retail prices of gasoline and kerosene are:

First. The Standard companies fix those prices throughout the country, and such prices in contiguous territory between the different Standard companies frequently vary all the way from 1 to 3 cents a gallon for gasoline.

Second. The companies of the Standard group cooperate with each other where such cooperation seems desirable or necessary in order to meet the competition of independents.

Third. While there is some correspondence between the cost of crude and the prices of the refined products, the price of the refined product is far more apt to be kept abreast of the changes in the price of crude on a rising market than it is on a falling market.

The table, which will be found on page 63 of this report, proves the statement I have just read from the report.

In January, 1920, the average price of mid-continent crude oil per barrel was $2.96, nearly $3 per barrel. The average tank-wagon price of gasoline in Minneapolis was 22 cents; in Des Moines 22 cents, in Indianapolis 22 cents, in Detroit 23 cents, in St. Louis 21 cents, in Chicago 21 cents, in Milwaukee 22 cents, in Fargo 26 cents, and in Wichita 22 cents.

In January, 1921, the average price of mid-continent crude oil per barrel was $3.36. In Minneapolis the average tank-wagon price was 27 cents a gallon, in Des Moines 28, in Indianapolis 27, in Detroit 28, in St. Louis 25, in Chicago 26, in Milwaukee 27, in Fargo 31, and in Wichita 26.

Between January, 1921, and August, 1921, the price of crude oil in the mid-continent field fell to a dollar a barrel.

The average tank-wagon price of gasoline in Minneapolis was 20 cents a gallon, in Des Moines 19 cents, in Indianapolis 17 cents, in Detroit 17 cents, in St. Louis 17 cents, in Chicago 17 cents, in Milwaukee 19 cents, in Fargo 23 cents, and in Wichita 17 cents.

When the price of crude rises this great monopoly advances the prices of gasoline and other refined products to the consumer. When the price of crude is put down, then the prices of gasoline do not follow in the same way. They lag behind, as the report states.

I wish to read from the report a little further:

The figures show that the Standard group represent about 45 per cent of the refinery capacity, the larger independent refineries about 40 per cent, and the balance is assigned to the very small refineries throughout the country. It is probable that if the exact figures were obtainable that the refinery production of the country is about equally divided between the so-called Standard group and the independents. There is, however, this very great difference between the two groups, as will be observed from the foregoing tables.

Which I have not taken the time of the Senate to refer to.

The principal refineries of the Standard group are located near the centers of population in the East, while those of the independent group, generally speaking, are located in the West, near the producing fields. This is especially true of the many small independent refineries not shown on the foregoing table. The States of New York, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, Michigan, and Missouri have more than 50 per cent of the population of the United States, while the territory of these States embraces only about 14 per cent of the area of the United States. In these States are located the great Standard Oil refineries of the Atlantic Refining Co., Standard Oil Co. of Ohio, Solar Refining Co., Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, Standard Oil Co. of Kentucky, Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, Vacuum Oil Co., and the Standard Oil Co. of New York. With the pipe-line connections which these refineries have with the producing fields, through which their supply of crude oil is received, it is obvious that the Standard Oil refineries as a group have a tremendous advantage over the independents when both location and pipe-line control are considered. Added to this is the fact, as previously pointed out, that the so-called patented cracking processes are largely under the control of the Standard companies.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I would like to say, in direct proof of what the Senator has just been reading—and it is conceded—that these large companies now have about eight months' oil supply in their pipe lines.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Or in storage.

Mr. TYDINGS. Or in storage. They have enough to run the United States eight months without any new oil. In addition to that, with only 51 per cent of all production, added to what they have in storage, without buying a single gallon of oil, they can supply the United States with oil for over a year without buying one gill of oil from any independent company. A monopoly of that magnitude, with that tremendous supply, ipso facto does not have to go out and buy oil, and by withholding purchases it drives the prices down and the producer has to sell at a very low price.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Obviously, and if this tariff is enacted and is effective, it will immediately increase the inventories of these companies with great storage capacity, add to their profits, and extract extortionate increases in price from the consumers of the refined products.

The report continues:

By these processes the average production of gasoline can be nearly doubled if the operator so desires. These facts show how impossible it is for the independent refinery to compete on equal terms with members of the Standard group. The refineries belonging to the two or three larger so-called independent companies, such as the Sinclair, Texas, and Gulf, have been able to overcome this handicap to a large extent by their own pipe-line facilities and by obtaining control of some one of the several cracking processes. These companies in their relationships, organization, and operation are more comparable to the Standard group than to the smaller independent companies.

It is proposed, in order to secure relief for the small independent producers of oil, to grant to this great monopoly, which dominates the oil industry as completely as it did before the dissolution decree of 1911, the advantage of the imposition of this tariff against foreign crude oil, the excuse, if one is needed, for an advance in the price of crude oil and likewise an advance in the price of gasoline.

However, it is clearly demonstrated that this monopoly so completely controls the industry that any relief which those who advocate this amendment believe will flow to the independent producers will be absorbed by the great monopoly and will be used to the further disadvantage of the independent producers.

I am sympathetic with the plight of these independent producers. I have argued this question with several of them, and never have I found a single representative of the industry who to-day refutes the facts and findings disclosed by the Committee on Manufactures. Their only plea is that in their desperation they seek through this means some relief, although down in their hearts many of them are doubtful as to whether it will actually save their stake in this industry.

The protective tariff was first advocated on the theory that we could extend this special privilege to American producers in the belief that free competition behind the tariff wall would protect the ultimate consumer from an extravagant and extortionate price for the products thus protected. There was justification for support of that theory before this great integration of business—this great monopoly, for instance, of the oil industry—had been obtained. But what justification can there be to-day for increasing the price of a commodity to the consumer when we all know that the industry thus to be benefited is completely dominated by one of the greatest monopolies the world has ever seen?

Assuming for the moment that the argument that this will benefit the independents is sound, the theory is, apparently, that we are justified in asking the consumer to pay an increased price without there being any protection of the consumer through the competition of the independents.

I venture the assertion that there is not an independent oil producer in the United States who, if he speaks frankly, will not admit that the Standard Oil Co., and the other great companies which cooperate with it, dominate and control the price of crude oil from the time it leaves the ground until the refined product is purchased by the consumer.

The plea made is that we must save these independents in order that they may afford us some protection against the extortion of the monopoly. The fact remains, however, that the independents have never been able, even in the flush times of this industry, to afford the consumer any protection against the domination and control of the price of oil by the great monopoly.

As I view the situation, all four of the industries seeking relief under the tariffs in this revenue bill are urged to do so because of the general conditions of business in the United States. They act like drowning men grasping at straws. They do not hear the arguments made against their contention; they merely point to the distress of those who have invested their capital, and of those who were previously employed by the industry. They fail to recognize that industries which have enjoyed extortionate and exorbitant tariff protection ever since the theory was put into operation in this country are likewise in the same distressed conditions as are those industries which are not protected.

That brings me, Mr. President, to the question of the effect upon the situation in the world to-day of the enactment of these tariff items, and others which may be engrafted upon this bill. I think any impartial student of world economic conditions will recognize that one of the most serious aspects of the whole problem is that of the tariff barriers which have been erected in the countries of the world.

The passage of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill in 1930 resulted in retaliatory or imitative action on the part of practically all the countries of the world. We share a great responsibility for having initiated this economic war through the implements of exorbitant or prohibitive tariffs. Many students of this question have pointed out that, since we took the initiative in throwing down this gage of economic battle, if the world is to be saved from this madness of prohibitive tariffs, the United States must take the lead in securing a more reasonable application of the tariff theory.

It has been my confident hope that this country would assume such leadership. Instead of assuming that leadership, however, we are now asked by certain industries in distress in the United States to enact further legislation following in the footsteps of the Smoot-Hawley bill.

Mr. President, in the report of the Secretary of Commerce for 1931 it is stated that depression has "retarded expansion of our industries into foreign fields through the establishment of branch factories"; that "with the notable exception of Canada, there has been no development of any significance during the last two years"; that "there is no reason to expect a resumption of activity before a general business revival takes place."

From this report I quote the following paragraph:

> The exceptional situation in Canada serves to confirm the conclusion * * * that the tariff policies of foreign countries constitute the most important single factor in the expansion of our industries beyond the boundaries of the country. The upward revisions of the Canadian tariff by the Conservative Government in September, 1930, and June, 1931, were definitely and officially stated to be for the purpose of encouraging the industrial development of the country; the success of the protectionist tariff policy, as evidenced by the establishment of new American branch plants, has been repeatedly stressed by the leaders of the Government during the tariff debates. * * * According to a statement by the Premier on June 1, 1931, 87 new foreign branch plants, including 74 American, have been established in Canada since August, 1930. No information is available as regards the amount of investment involved.

The Dominion Bureau of Statistics, in a statement of September 15, 1931, gave the number of American branch plants in Canada as 1,071 and the capital investment as $1,189,590,000. These figures, in addition to pulp and paper investments, which were excluded from the earlier reports of the Department of Commerce, included American investments for the exploitation of Canadian mineral resources, public-utility investments, and various other investments in enterprises not engaged in manufacturing.

A more recent report, made by the Canadian Pacific Railway to the Toronto Industrial Commission, April 15, 1932, stated that 145 American branch plants had been established in Canada during the last two years. Seventy of these were established in Toronto, 41 in Quebec, and 20 in Montreal. Included among the products of the new branch plants were foodstuffs, vegetable and animal products, textiles, wood and paper products, iron and steel products, nonferrous metal products and nonmetallic mineral products, chemicals and allied products, and toilet accessories. If the average investment in the new plants approximated the average investment in American plants in Canada prior to 1930, the total investment represented by the new establishments is about $150,000,000.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Bearing in mind that American capital presumably might be employing American workers, does the Senator from Wisconsin have any figures listing the number of workers in foreign branch factories who are now employed by American capital?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not have that information, I will say to the Senator, and I do not know that it is available.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator let me give him a few statistics?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would prefer, unless the Senator merely wishes to ask me a question, that he do so when I shall have finished.

Mr. LONG. I will ask a question, then. I was wondering, in connection with what the Senator was saying about the prices of crude oil as affecting the price of gasoline, if he had been given statistics showing that when crude oil sold for $2.04 in 52 of the cities of America, including, of course, many of the leading cities, gasoline sold for 18.09 cents a gallon, and that when crude oil sold for $1.20 a barrel the same gasoline sold for 18.39 cents a gallon. In other words, when the oil was nearly $1 per barrel cheaper, gasoline was higher in the leading cities of America.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is just the point I have been trying to make, that this monopoly so dominates and controls the industry that it can charge any price it pleases for the refined product, regardless of what it pays for the crude.

Mr. SMOOT. Then why could we not get some revenue out of the crude?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I can not understand the position of the Senator from Utah on the revenue involved in this amendment. He presented to the Senate a report showing there is $5,000,000 of revenue in the tariff on oil. Then he presents some subsequent figures to prove that the Treasury estimate, which he has been exhorting all of us to stand by in connection with other items in the bill, is all wrong, and that we are going to get three or four times that amount.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, I have made no such statement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, there has been reference made in the debate previously to the retaliatory action which countries principally affected by the products proposed to be included in the tariff items in the bill are not only contemplating but have already taken. After the experience which we had following the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley bill in 1930 we are now being urged by the supporters of the tariff items in the bill to take action which will result in further retaliatory measures being taken by the countries chiefly affected, and thus further to curtail our already languishing export trade.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I submit this question to the Senator in respect to the matter of retaliation? Is it not a fact that much of the retaliation relates to the copper tariff?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Not entirely. So far as I know, Peru has not taken any definite action as yet. But, as pointed out by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] in the debate yesterday, Canada has already taken steps to put retaliatory measures into operation immediately in case these tariffs remain in the bill. I also had in mind the statements which have been quoted in the debate previously concerning the contemplated action by Peru for a 300 per cent duty on American products and the efforts which she is alleged to be making to form a South American customs union directed against American export trade.

Mr. VANDENBERG. This is the inquiry I want to submit to the Senator. No one would be more disappointed than I in the face of further retaliatory difficulties in international trade. I join the Senator in that attitude. But in view of the fact that every foreign country which has even intimated retaliation against the copper tariff has itself had a copper tariff for many years, does not the Senator think that a protest from those sources is utterly illogical and, if submitted to upon our part, is a surrender to a threat rather than a surrender to any rational process of consideration?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator might just as well say that because Canada had had tariffs before we passed the Smoot-Hawley bill, which seemed to the people of Canada to be particularly hard upon them, that they should not have raised their tariffs against us. I submit to the Senator from Michigan that it is not so much the logic of the situation which confronts us as it is the reality of it. Regardless of whether Peru has had a tariff on copper or not, if as a result of action taken by the Congress at a time when obviously it is impossible for us to give adequate consideration to the question in a tax bill, Peru levies a 300 per cent duty against all American exports to that country, the action is a result nevertheless of our action in placing a tariff on copper. Likewise the tariff increases which will no doubt be made by Canada will be the result of the action which we take with regard to lumber and coal, should they go into the bill, regardless of whether or not Canada now has a tariff on those items.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator be good enough to let me submit one further observation?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator asks that we consult realities rather than the theory of the thing. I want to consult realities, and I submit this thought to the Senator. Copper production in Chile, Peru, and Canada to-day, as well as in the United States, is chiefly met, as the Senator well knows, by the new production in South Africa, which is an amazing discovery. Chile has protection for her copper against South Africa. Canada has protection for her copper against South Africa. Peru has protection for her copper against South Africa. Are we called upon, in the Senator's judgment, to leave our American market the only open market on the earth in which that cheap copper from South Africa can be dumped?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My answer to the Senator's question is that, regardless of whether or not Peru has had a tariff on copper, if a tariff on copper in this country results in the closing down of the mines in Peru, if it results in the abandonment of her principal railroad, we can not expect to reason with Peru. Her act is but a natural reaction to the course which we have taken. In other words, she regards our tariff on copper as being directed against her, because she suffers the immediate and disastrous result of our action.

I admit that the Senator might very well say that the reaction of the Peruvian people and their Government was not a logical reaction in view of the premise which he has stated for his question. But I ask the Senator to consider what will be the result if we enact a duty which causes the governments of South America to form a customs union and to shut out the export business which we are sorely in need of in those countries.

However, I do not base my entire opposition to these tariffs upon the feature of retaliation and the further blocking of the flow of world commerce. I contend that of necessity, in the situation which confronts us in the consideration of these various items, we are unable to give them the consideration which they merit. I contend, further, Mr. President, that we endanger the orderly progress of this important tax bill by consuming the time that must of necessity be taken up by consideration not only of the four tariff items reported by the committee but of other tariff amendments, which inevitably will be injected into the debate and into the consideration of the bill if those four items remain in the bill.

I suppose, Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just one more question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator see any distinction between commodities which are now upon the dutiable list and which can go to the Tariff Commission for relief and commodities which are on the free list which have no recourse except to Congress, which have the benefit of reports from the Tariff Commission and which are threatened with extinction, except as they have relief? Does the Senator see any distinction between the two classifications?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I see the different positions that they are in; but, in so far as any relief which they might hope to get within reasonable time from the present Tariff Commission is concerned, it seems to me that they are all practically in the same boat—whether they are on the dutiable list or on the free list.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will ask the Senator from Michigan what he thinks of the lumber tariff which has been inserted in the bill, and against which the Tariff Commission has reported, and elicit from him whether or not he thinks we ought to pass on that measure at this session of Congress.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am not discussing, except in a general way, the tariff items in the bill other than the one now under consideration. I presume the Senator from Michigan will state his position on the other tariff proposals, as I expect to state mine when they come up. I do wish to point out, however, that this is a time when the leadership on both sides of this Chamber should assert itself. That leadership, after all, is responsible for what the Senate does with the tax bill. I fully understand the pressure being put upon Senators who represent various States in which these industries seeking what I believe to be an illusory relief through a tariff are located. But if we are to preserve orderly procedure in the consideration of this bill, the time has come for leadership upon both sides of the aisle here. These tariff items should be eliminated from the bill in order that we may proceed to the consideration of the important fiscal problems that are involved in the revenue features of this measure.

Unless we strike these tariffs from the bill we shall be confronted with a chaotic situation. Not only will the four tariff items in the bill as reported from the committee consume a disproportionate and unjustifiable length of time but other items will be offered and the debate upon those items will delay the passage of the bill for weeks.

If Senators want to go into a general revision of the tariff, I am ready to stay here all summer. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] has been reading the record votes of Senators upon some of the hundreds of items upon which record votes were taken in the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill. So far as I can see, Mr. President, those votes have no more relation to the broad question of policy which we are to follow in connection with the pending measure than "the flowers that bloom in the spring." When the tariff bill was under consideration, obviously it was our task to revise the tariff. Speaking for myself, I tried to exercise the best judgment of which I was capable, after listening to the arguments, in coming to a determination as to the fair and just rates to be supported in connection with the various items of the bill.

I contend that we must save the time of the Senate by eliminating these tariff items from the bill. We should devote our time and our energies to framing the best tax bill which the composite judgment of this Congress can work out. Unless we do that, I reiterate we shall be inviting a general revision of the tariff which will block the passage of the pending bill for weeks.

If that is what the leaders of the Senate desire, if that is what the chairman of the committee, who is responsible for the conduct of this bill, desires, I am ready to stay here and work on a general revision of the tariff as many months as the Senate may elect to give to it; but I protest against such a course.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator before he takes his seat, sharing as I do completely his anxiety for speed, he having concluded his address, does he not agree with me that it would now be advisable to call the roll and ascertain whether it is going to be necessary to debate this problem any longer?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. So far as I am concerned, I am ready to vote on this question. I can not speak for other Senators who have not discussed it and who may desire to argue it further. But, as I say, so far as I am concerned I am ready for a vote. I was ready for a vote in the Finance Committee the day we met. I hoped then that the action I urged upon the committee would be taken. It was not taken, however. I realize if the votes are here to put these tariff items in the bill that we are going to have a revision of the tariff, and I will be resigned to it. The Senator knows that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Would the Senator agree to a unanimous-consent request to vote at 2 o'clock?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. So far as I am concerned I shall be very glad to agree to such a request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DILL in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Jones	Sheppard
Austin	Cutting	Kendrick	Shortridge
Bailey	Davis	Keyes	Smith
Bankhead	Dill	La Follette	Smoot
Barbour	Fess	Lewis	Steiwer
Barkley	Fletcher	Logan	Stephens
Bingham	Frazier	Long	Thomas, Idaho
Blaine	George	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Glass	McNary	Townsend
Brookhart	Glenn	Metcalf	Trammell
Bulkley	Goldsborough	Moses	Tydings
Bulow	Gore	Neely	Vandenberg
Capper	Hale	Norris	Wagner
Caraway	Harrison	Nye	Walcott
Cohen	Hastings	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Connally	Hatfield	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Coolidge	Hayden	Reed	Watson
Copeland	Hull	Robinson, Ark.	Wheeler
Costigan	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.	White

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] are detained at a meeting of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I hope I may have the attention for a moment of the Senators on the other side of the aisle.

Some one in speaking yesterday made the assertion that President Hoover should take a hand in this matter, wipe out these tariffs, get the members of his party here to line up with him, and pass this tax bill promptly.

Normally I do not believe that the President should interfere with the legislative branch of the Government. We are here to pass the laws, and the President's duty is to approve or reject them. However, the majority leader yesterday made the statement that a preliminary poll showed that there were 29 Democrats against these tariffs and 18 Republicans against them, making a total of 47; that there were 18 Democrats for the tariffs and 30 Republicans for them, making a total of 48. That is on the whole tariff picture. I understand that some of the Senators who favor one tariff do not favor another; and, as a result of the logrolling process, if certain Members do not get the tariff they want on the particular commodity produced in their State they will, of course, turn around and vote against tariffs on the other commodities.

The point is that for one solid day, without any Senator speaking more than once, the tariff and not the revenue bill, has been discussed. We have been debating the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad and the whole gamut of tariff arguments. While a deficit of $3,000,000,000 impends, with every business man frightened, with 10,000,000 people unemployed, with 4,800 bank failures in the last two years, with nearly three-quarters of a million farms sold under mortgage foreclosure or because of delinquent taxes, we sit here and debate a tariff bill, while every man in the country has his eyes upon us and asks us to pass this bill and balance the Budget!

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a minute.

Mr. President, the way to pass this tax bill is to take these controversial tariff measures out of it. It should be obvious to any man with good eyesight and good ears and a reasonable amount of intelligence that if we are to consider these four items and if they are adopted, motions to reconsider will be entered, and we will debate them over and over and over again, and waste time, in a period of tremendous emergency.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. In just a minute, when I finish, I will yield.

I think the President is justified in interfering in that emergency. Moreover, I think it is his duty. I respect the fact that up to now he has not called upon the Congress to put these tariffs out of the bill, because he had reason to believe there was enough intelligence, enough common sense, and enough patriotism in this body to do the job without asking him for his assistance. Now, if 30 members of his party out of 47 are for these tariffs, and if 29 Members on this side of the aisle are against them, we need but very little assistance from the other side of the aisle to make these tariff items as dead as Methuselah.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator let me ask him one question?

Mr. TYDINGS. When I finish I will yield to anyone. I want to conclude what I am saying now.

With 10,000,000 people unemployed, with the Budget unbalanced, with the whole world in chaos, with fear not national but international, I say that for the Senate to sit here and take up a tariff item is enough to precipitate a situation the noun for which I hesitate to utter.

Have we gone mad? Have we lost all sense of reality? Have we no idea that if we carry this period of unrest and fear from one week to another a panic will break loose in this country which all the tariffs under heaven will never stem? And yet we sit here to take care of some little interest in this State or that State, instead of rising above the petty sectionalism of the moment and acting for the Nation.

"My State!" "My State!" My God, let us hear "My country"; because what good is your State if your country sinks into the quagmire of ruin? Can we not engender enough manhood and patriotism, even if it means our political defeat, to say, "I will serve my country, no matter what the consequences may be"?

We expect men to go out upon the battlefield in times of war; and when the word goes forward, and shells are breaking all over the ground, and machine guns are sending their bullets through the air, and the enemy is entrenched, we expect men to go forward and lay down their lives to save the business and the institutions of government. We come here in times of peace and make the sacrifice of the dead look like a travesty of patriotism, and talk about the interests of "my State." My God! The country's interests should receive some consideration here.

I say, and I say respectfully, that if the man at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue had interjected into this fight his leadership up to this time he might have been justly criticized; but I say it is perfectly evident now that we are in the midst of a tariff battle, and it only takes a word from the White House to the leaders of this body, it only takes a suggestion to the country to ask their Senators to pass this bill quickly, drop these controversial matters, raise the taxes, and balance the Budget, and the country will respond.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator from Maryland would sit down, we could dispose of the tariff items.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not a point of order. The Senator from Maryland will proceed.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the point of most disorder is an interruption of that character.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that every Senator in this body would like to have the bill passed. Will the Senator agree now to a vote upon all of these amendments?

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator give me the right to put phosphate in this bill and ask for a vote upon it?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can offer any amendment he desires.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator give me the right to put wood pulp up for a vote? I ask the Senator. Let him answer. I answered his question. Why should not all the tariff items have an equal right? Who are the "big four"?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can offer the amendment, of course.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Utah has gotten himself into this fix by letting the copper interests of Utah stand out bigger than his own country in this period of emergency, and he the leader of the Finance Committee!

Mr. SMOOT. I deny the statement, and I say that the Senator is absolutely wrong. I have never asked for a duty on copper. Copper has been on the free list for years and years. I have been here and voted on duties since 1909, the year of the first tariff bill that was passed during my service, and I have never asked for any duty upon copper.

Mr. TYDINGS. I say to the Senator now that he can have his revenue bill passed in no time at all, and it would have been passed by this hour if he had not voted to inject these things into it.

Mr. SMOOT. It could have been passed long ago if the Senator from Maryland had not taken the time that he already has taken.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; if the Senator from Maryland had sat idly by and seen the people of America taxed $487,000,000 a year, not for the benefit of the Government but for the benefit of 20 large oil companies. When the Senator from Maryland does that I hope the people will come and get him by the back of the neck and take him out of this Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that back of all of that are a few industries in Maryland, over in Baltimore, who are interested in this.

Mr. TYDINGS. Am I asking for any tariff?

Mr. SMOOT. No; but the Senator wants them to have a free hand, just as they have had always.

Mr. TYDINGS. They are going to have just as much consideration as the Senator's constituents in Utah have, as long as I stand in this body.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not objected to it, and the only one who is objecting to the consideration now is the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. But the Senator knows that if I start to offer these amendments he will be the first one to suggest that there be no discussion of them, that we hurry up and pass the tax bill, after he has gotten protection for copper in Utah.

Mr. President, the future of this country is none too bright. The future of the world is dark. Everywhere we see international hatreds rising like clouds, shutting out the sunshine of international good will and international trade. Everyone realizes that. International animosities break all bounds. In parts of the world there is almost a state of war, without guns being fired. Revolutions stir the whole world, in Spain, in Italy, in Poland, in Germany, in South America, in England, and almost in this country. Yet we stand here, with the great necessity of balancing the Budget and restoring confidence before us, and can not rise above the petty, little, pitiful, interests of our own respective States. Yet when war comes, we do not hesitate in this body to vote to draft men, and tell them to go out and die, when we ourselves in times of peace have not courage enough to kill a fly.

Mr. President, I say that it is up to the leader of this country, who is neither a Democrat nor a Republican in this case, but an American, to tell the Congress to cut this tariff debate out, to take these items out of the bill, and pass it, and save this country from ruin while there is yet time to act.

The Senator from Utah knows, as well as I do, that even if these amendments are adopted, if these tariff matters are written into the bill, motions will be filed to reconsider, and they will be debated all over again. The Senator does not deny that. That will consume days and weeks. The Senator from Nebraska is going to see, of course, that the farmers out in his section of the country are not left out in the cold. He is going to ask for the consideration of the export-debenture plan, and that will take weeks.

The fiscal year will end on the 30th of June, a bare six weeks away. Are we to go into the next fiscal year with a rising deficit of $3,000,000,000, and no tax bill passed to take care of it, and still another year coming on, with a greater and an increasing deficit?

I call on the President, not as a Democrat, because my position here is too small to command the attention of the country. I call on the President to go on the radio and ask the people of this country to tell their representatives here to act; and, believe me, we will pass the bill with about 96 votes in the affirmative.

The press of the country denounces this tariff measure to-day. There is not a paper of reputable standing in the country that justifies the insertion of these tariff items in this bill at this time.

The public does not want them in the bill. The public wants the Budget balanced, because even if you save the oil industry—which, in my judgment, will not amount to the snap of a finger under this bill, as far as helping the independent producer is concerned—even if you save the copper industry or the lumber industry or the coal industry, if you do not save your country what good will it do?—

What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?

The leader on the other side of the aisle admitted that 18 Democrats favor these tariffs and that 30 Republicans favor it. I do not know whether that is accurate or not. It means, if it is accurate, that 29 Democrats are opposed to them and ready to vote them out of the bill, while only 18 Republicans oppose them. Let the President, not as a Republican, not as a Democrat, but as the leader of all the people, appeal to the country. If he does issue one more statement and goes on the radio, I say to my Democratic friends on this side that he will gain a million votes overnight, and Senators over here have not discernment enough to see that they are kicking Hoover upstairs so fast that it looks as if he is going up in an airplane.

If he were to say this instant something along the line of my suggestion, it would take a force of dozens of stenographers to answer the protests which would come in on this body, and I believe those protests would be justified.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Does not the Senator think that the President has already done enough for these four big oil companies?

Mr. TYDINGS. In this great emergency I hope, and I am going to say that I think, the President is bigger than any 4 big oil companies, any 10 big copper companies, any 3 big lumber companies, or any 25 big coal companies; and if he is not, then God help this Republic.

Mr. President, I send to the desk an article from to-day's Washington Daily News typical of many editorials, which I ask to have the clerk read in my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am not very well acquainted with the rules of the Senate, as the Chair knows. The Senator, I assume, has a right to have this communication read by the clerk; or does it take unanimous consent?

Mr. TYDINGS. If I may answer before the Chair responds, I will say that the rules of courtesy should receive equal standing with the rules of the Senate; although the rules of the Senate support my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say——

Mr. LONG. I object to the Senator having the clerk read anything.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Louisiana that any Senator may make a request to have an article read, and the Chair usually says that, without objection, the clerk will read. If there is any objection——

Mr. LONG. I object.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let the article be sent back to me, and I will read it.

Mr. LONG. I object to the clerk reading anything for him.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am very grateful that 94 other Senators did not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Maryland wait a moment?

Mr. TYDINGS. I would not accept a favor from one who has so little regard for courtesy as to give it at this belated time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will please be in order. The proper procedure is, when a Senator objects to the reading of an article at the desk, for the Chair to submit to the Senate the question of its reading, which shall be decided without debate.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I move that the Senate grant the privilege to the Senator from Maryland to have his extract read by the clerk in such form as is the customary practice of this body in extending courtesies from one Senator to another.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois. [Putting the question.]

The ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, before the reading of the article I am sending to the desk takes place, I would like to thank Senators for the sportsmanship and fair play of those who voted in the affirmative and have that quality.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

THE TARIFF RAIDERS

The vital task of balancing the Federal Budget is threatened by the tariff lobby. They say they will hold up the tax bill all summer unless they are allowed to attach their tariff riders. The anti-tariff forces reply that if oil, coal, lumber, and copper tariffs are jammed into the tax bill they will fight to put 500 other tariff items of their own into the bill.

We happen to oppose a higher tariff as destructive of business—so proved by the Hawley-Smoot monstrosity which has destroyed foreign trade, started a world trade war, and prolonged the depression. But that is not the issue here.

Whether higher tariffs are good or bad, they have no place in a tax bill. Most of them are virtual embargoes which will raise little or no revenue.

If one such tariff is accepted in the tax bill the way will be open for all of the degrading logrolling which characterizes a tariff bill. That means unscrupulous trading. It means months of delay.

The Democratic leaders in the Senate are trying to save the tax bill by fighting off the tariff raiders. The Republican leaders, as usual, are on the tariff side—rule or ruin.

Here is a chance for the President, the bankers, the business men, and all and sundry who have been pleading for prompt passage of an adequate tax bill to balance the Budget, to help rescue the bill from the tariff raid.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, another striking feature about this contest which is now going on is the fact that we are having an exact duplication of what happened in the House of Representatives, where both parties broke, and, under the leadership of Mr. LAGUARDIA, of New York, more or less overrode the recommendations of the Ways and Means Committee and chaos ensued.

Nothing in these tariffs will hurt the revenue-raising proposition at all; but the situation is reversed here because the party that was in the minority in the House is in the majority in the Senate, and we find the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] the leader in this fight. We find many on the other side of the aisle—and many on this side of the aisle—following the leadership of the Senator from Louisiana. We find the committee has thrown overboard the consideration of revenue raising; and that, under the banner raised by the Senator from Louisiana, the chairman of the Finance Committee, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], is enlisted as first sergeant and right guide. We find other Senators over there similarly situated, and I regret that we have some corporals and privates over on this side; but it is a rather unusual army, and the new general upon the field has walked out and taken command, while Privates SMOOT, WATSON, and the rest of them march under the new Long banner. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I refuse to yield to a man who does not understand what the definition of courtesy is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland declines to yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yesterday I read what would happen to the farmers of this country if this tariff were adopted and were effective, how it would raise their operating costs in each State of the Union. To-day I have a more comprehensive table. First of all, this table shows the number of automobiles on the farms of each State. It shows the number of motor trucks on the farms of each State. It shows the number of tractors on the farms of each State. It shows the number of stationary gas engines on the farms of each State. It shows the average yearly consumption of gasoline by all motor vehicles, trucks, tractors, and stationary engines. It shows the total amount of gasoline consumed on farms, and the additional cost to the farmers, by States, if a tariff of 4 cents a gallon is levied on gasoline, as is proposed in this bill, with the correction that under the proposed rate of 2½ cents, the totals in the last column should be 62½ per cent of the figures given.

I ask that this table be inserted in the RECORD, and that those who represent agricultural States will hear in due course of time from those who will have these bills to pay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The table is as follows:

The cost of an oil tariff to American farmers

[It has been estimated that the proposed tariff on imported crude oil or refined petroleum products, or both, will increase the average retail price of gasoline throughout the United States by 4 cents per gallon. No one group would be more severely affected by such an increase than the farmers, who utilize 25 per cent of all gasoline consumed in the United States in operation of their automobiles, trucks, tractors, and stationary engines. The tariff-added cost to farmers would aggregate $150,000,000 yearly]

[1] From 1930 Farm Census, U. S. Department of Commerce.

[2] Computed from "Gasoline taxes, 1930," U. S. Department of Agriculture.

NOTE.—Average consumption of gasoline per year for motor vehicles (automobiles and trucks) was 539 gallons in 1930. It is conservatively estimated that the average tractor will consume 700 gallons per year and the average stationary engine 400 gallons. The was of all United States farms reporting the use of gasoline-driven equipment is as follows (U. S. Department of Commerce): Automobiles, 58 per cent; motor trucks, 13.4 per cent; tractors, 13.5 per cent; stationary gasoline engines, 15 per cent. An increased gasoline cost will tend to decrease the percentage of farmers who can afford to avail themselves of the benefits of these efficient farm tools.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I also want to insert in the RECORD an estimate of the amount that it will cost the consumers in each State if we place a tariff of 2½ cents a gallon on gasoline. The figures I read yesterday dealt only with the farms. The figures I have to-day deal with all of the motor vehicles on the farms, by States, and the figures, of course, are much higher than those I read yesterday.

I ask all farmers who receive the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to note the votes of their Senators on this bill, and to acquaint those who do not receive the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with the votes of their Senators on this bill, in order that they may determine by action rather than words who really is for farm relief in this country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the table will be inserted in the RECORD.

The table is as follows:

[1] Bureau of Mines estimate.

Mr. TYDINGS. It is claimed here that oil is in a very bad position. I have a table, prepared by the Department of Labor, of indexes as of January, 1931, to February, 1932, inclusive, showing for the 12 months of the year 1931 and the first 2 months of 1932 that the index price of oil is above the index price of commodities generally; so notwithstanding oil is now in a more favorable condition than commodities as a whole, these men have the effrontery to come on the floor of the Senate and ask for a larger boost so they may be still farther raised above the commodity price level of the country. In January, 1932, the commodity price level of all commodities, 784 in number, was 67.3. Fuel and lighting, including oil, was 67.9. In February, 1932, all commodities had an index price of 66.3 and oil 68.3, an increase of 2 per cent over the commodity level; so that alone, in a period of great depression, when every industry, when every business, when every commodity, when every person is suffering, does not justify the oil industry in coming here and asking for additional help at this time.

I ask that the table may be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[1] Revised as of Jan. 1, 1932, by including prices for 784 items instead of 550 items.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I want to show the oil prices for 1931 and the present prices of oil. I am quoting figures from the National Petroleum News. The low price for 1931 was 40 cents in the United States. In April, 1932, it was 81 cents, an increase of 41 cents. The percentage of increase is 102.5 per cent. In other words, from the low price level of 1931 crude oil in domestic fields has increased in price to this day 102.5 per cent, and no Senator will deny it. What other commodity has had an increase in price from the low of 1931 to the present moment of 102.5 per cent? I would like to know of such a commodity. I do not believe there is another one in the whole country. If copper were in that situation my friend from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], at whom I am looking at this moment, would not need a copper tariff because its price has not risen, but the oil price has gone up over 100 per cent from the low of 1931.

I ask that this table may be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Low prices for 1931 and present prices (April 11, 1932) of crude oil in domestic fields

Mr. TYDINGS. What does the Treasury say about the revenue features of this nefarious proposition? The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is either inconsistent or insincere, because he signed the report saying that this tariff would yield the Government a mere $5,000,000 a year, and after he had written that in black on white over his own signature he comes upon the floor and says that it will raise as much as $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 a year. Obviously, he could not be right both times. I simply mention that as an example of the kind of elasticity that gets into these tariff arguments.

I hope my friend from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], now sitting over on the other side of the Chamber, whom I have often known to rise on the floor and plead for the farmers, showing how money was given to the big railroads and to the big corporations and to Wall Street and to what not, will not be taken in by the sophistry which is being presented here by the proponents of this tariff, and that he will not place upon his constituents, the farmers of Iowa, an additional gasoline bill of $5,403,060 a year more than they are now paying, which will not go into the Treasury of the Government, but will go into the treasury of the major oil companies and for which the farmer will not receive a single solitary bit of benefit.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; I have presented the case of the farmers in the figures the Senator mentioned. The Senator has opposed me so consistently that I have a certain amount of suspicion when he comes in on my side now.

Mr. TYDINGS. When the Senator does present this matter to the farmers of Iowa, let him tell them that these large oil companies already have a year's supply of oil, without buying a single gill, enough for one year's supply to every man, woman, and child in the country who uses gasoline; and if they know that to be true, which is true by the Government's own report, all he will do by these new taxes is to put $486,000,000 into the treasury of those large oil companies. Then let him justify his position in view of these facts if he can.

I want to take up the so-called revenue features of the bill and show the absurdity of the whole thing in this internal-revenue matter. If the proposed tax becomes effective as an embargo, the intent of its authors, it will cost the American public approximately $500,000,000 annually, not a penny of which will go into the Federal Treasury, but all of which, taken from an already burdened public, will go into the coffers of the major oil companies of this Republic. That money is going to come from communities which are going down in their own pockets to keep the people from starving to death. It is going to come from communities where farms are being sold under the hammer every day. It is going to come from communities where hundreds of banks have failed—600 of them in the State of Iowa alone. It is going to come from communities where people fear to look ahead unless we can turn from the valley of despair and climb once more to the heights of promise and prosperity.

It is estimated, based on the figures of the Bureau of Mines, that the American public last year consumed 16,712,000,000 gallons of gasoline. If that figure is multiplied by 2½ cents, the total will be $417,000,000. The increased cost of fuel oil will add another $75,000,000 to be taken from the public, making a total of almost $500,000,000. Ninety per cent of this money will go to the great oil companies who process, transport, wholesale, and retail most of the products.

The monopolistic subject made its legislative debut in the McCumber-Fordney bill 10 years ago. It was thrown out as too raw even for the high protectionists then. During the intervening decade swarms of locust lobbyists have hibernated at the Capitol and at the slightest prospect of success they have sought to have it enacted into law under one guise or another as a tariff or an embargo. Never until the present year have they had the temerity to urge it as a rider upon a revenue measure, but now under the skillful guidance of the lobby they have injected it into the revenue bill with the present threat that they will delay indefinitely the passage of legislation essential to the balancing of the Budget and the preservation of the national credit unless this un-American subsidy is adopted.

In the McCumber-Fordney bill the proposed rates were 25 cents on fuel oil and 35 cents a barrel on crude oil. The other by-products were not included. When it reappeared in the Smoot-Hawley bill, it was all embracing, $1 a barrel on crude oil and 50 per cent ad valorem on all its by-products. Dozens of other bills of similar import have been introduced.

When the tariff was under discussion in the House, Secretary Mills reported—New York Journal of Commerce, February 22, 1932—and mark you this, those who claim it will put revenue in the Treasury:

It is the opinion of the experts of the Department of Commerce—

The opinion of Mr. Hoover's own department, the opinion of the department he built up, backed up by Mr. Mills, who is closer to the President, perhaps, than any other member of the Cabinet. Here is what Mr. Mills said:

It is the opinion of the experts of the Department of Commerce such a tax, 1 or 2 cents per gallon on imported oil, would yield no revenue, since the levy which would be added to the import price exceeds the margin of advantage under which oil is imported into this country, and would therefore exclude the products affected. The same would hold also for a tax on the basis of $1 a barrel, which entered into the discussion.

Follow me now, because I am coming to a very important bit of conversation which took place between the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], and Mr. Mills. When Secretary Mills appeared before the Senate Finance Committee on April 14, he was asked by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] about the matter of tariff in the revenue bill. He replied—and this is Mr. Mills, a member of the President's Cabinet, the President's official adviser if he has any, a high protectionist, a man who is trying to balance the Budget, a man to whom the whole country looks now for financial guidance. What did he say about these tariffs?—

Senator HULL, you have no illusion. I know some people have, but you have none as to the character of the two items in this bill.

They were coal and oil.

Senator HULL. I was hoping that I had not.

Secretary MILLS. I certainly have not. They are not revenue measures. They are protective-tariff measures.

Then the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]—I am sorry he is not here at the moment—has the effrontery to rise on the floor of the Senate and claim they are revenue measures, when the man charged with the responsibility of balancing the Budget comes here with all the cloak of officialdom, and says they are not revenue measures, but protective-tariff measures.

I continue the quotation:

Senator SHORTRIDGE. Would not this raise some additional revenue, Mr. Secretary? We are framing a bill for the purpose of securing additional revenue.

Secretary MILLS. Not car fare, though, Senator.

That is what Mr. Secretary Mills said. Revenue? It is nothing but car fare. We need to raise $1,200,000,000 to balance the Budget. What is proposed is, first, only a protective-tariff measure, and, secondly, a measure which will raise only car fare.

At this point I ask Mr. Hoover, the leader of the Republic, the leader of the Republicans, the leader of the Democrats, the leader of the Socialists, the leader of all political parties, to back up his Secretary of the Treasury, who knows about this matter, who has gone into it, and to tell his men, the leaders on the other side of the aisle and Senators on this side of the aisle to fall in line, to cut these tariff items out of the bill, balance the Budget, and restore confidence once again in the country while there is still time to act.

I make the prediction—I may be wrong, and I have many friends who are going to be included in the sweeping remark I am about to make—that there will be no vote cast in this entire Senate with so many political consequences of an evil nature as a vote at this time for these tariff measures, when all the people of this country, from California to Maine and from Florida to Washington, want the Budget balanced first.

These tariff items could not have been put into the bill without trades. I have voted for some tariff measures in my time, but not a man on this floor can say that I ever made a trade with him on any legislation. I think such a practice is beneath the dignity of a Senator and that he is unworthy to serve in this body if he can not present his proposition on its merits, without having to give something in which he does not believe in order to get a little slice of the pie he really wants for himself. He surrenders his convictions, he surrenders his principles, he surrenders his beliefs, in order that he may trot home with a little piece of decoration to his State and say, "Look what mamma brought you; here is a nice piece of tariff pie." That is the kind of opposition we are forced to fight, an opposition not based on conviction or principle, so it can muster a majority of votes in this body, but one glued together by trades, in which a third of them do not agree on any proposition submitted but will vote for it nevertheless because they may get a little bit of this tariff tax.

I say to Mr. Hoover, "Back up your Secretary of the Treasury." Ogden Mills is, I believe, rising above partisan politics as much as any man in public life to-day is rising above it. I think he sees the peril in which this country is now engulfed; I think he is throwing his vision ahead into the future; I think he was honest before the committee as much so as any man could be; and I say that the President should go along with him in helping to balance the Budget, and we in this body ought to do our part to give him support, not as Democrats or Republicans but in the effort to pass the best revenue bill we can, and leave these tariff measures out of the picture.

Many a Senator who will vote to-day to include these tariff items will wish one week hence that he had never heard of a tariff when we get into the tariff debate. The people of this country know what is going on. They know that there may be cases where an increased tariff is necessary; they know there may be cases where the tariff should be reduced; but they know that the great and important and primary problem now before this Congress is to pass this tax bill, leave the tariff out of it, get it behind us, and look forward to taking care of a relief program in order that we may avoid serious consequences next winter.

We shall vote after a while. I am rather inclined to have a vote, because I want to enjoy, without being a sadist, some of the contortions of those who vote on the initial question of a high tariff when they squirm a week, two weeks, three weeks, or four weeks hence when tons and tons of protests will be coming in here telling them to drop the tariff and get this bill through. It will be interesting to see them make an about face in the presence of an outraged and indignant public.

I am going to offer my 500 amendments now. Mr. President, as I said before, I do not want a single tariff item in this bill; I am opposed to all such items; their injection means months of delay; it will unsettle the country; it will add to the despair and despondency under which millions of people now labor; but if tariff items are to be considered, then I want the interests of my State to be given equal consideration with those of every other State in the Union. This is not a government for copper or oil or coal or lumber; it is a government of people, and the people want legislation more than do the few who control these four large interests.

I hope I will not have to press one of these amendments; I hope that, sooner or later, Senators will not insist upon the adoption of these tariff items; I hope that, sooner or later, the President will take the leadership, which I think now he is justified in asserting, and ask those on the other side of the aisle to join with the 29 of us on this side of the aisle. We only need 20 over there; that is all. If he will enable us to secure the support of just 20, we shall kill every one of these tariff items so dead that they will never raise their heads again at this session; and within 10 days or 2 weeks, in my judgment, we shall enact this tax bill into law and reassure the people of the country that Congress can function; that the Budget is balanced; and we can then turn to the more pressing problems, such as unemployment, which will remain over.

Every man who votes for these tariff items is delaying the day of relief for unemployment, because every day we lose here in discussing the tariff is a day that we could use to discuss some plan for the alleviation of suffering and unemployment. If we discuss the tariff for a month, that will mean that the consideration of unemployment relief must be put off a month, and the people want that question considered now. They do not want us here haggling over a tariff item designed to help a few rich oil companies. They want settled the pressing problem of balancing the Budget; they want a plan adopted to take care of unemployment; they want vision exercised in the effort to bring back some prosperity.

People are writing me saying, "Why do you gentlemen in the Senate not bring up the question of the World Court for consideration?" What good will the World Court be, if, under other circumstances, it would be any good, after we have increased the antipathies, the hates, the fears, and the prejudices of every country under the sun? Already tariff walls are growing like giant redwood trees around every country on the globe. Every nation is locking itself up in water-tight compartments on a sinking ship. We should be on the deck pumping water and not in our little water-tight compartment, where we may be saved temporarily but where we will go down with the rest of them when the ship sinks. Let us vote, Mr. President; let us stand up and be counted——

Mr. GORE. Call the roll.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let us see who is still for the people; let us see who is still for the large oil companies; let us see who wants the tariff injected into this tax bill and the balancing of the Budget postponed. Let us see who wants to transact business and to supplant words with action, to undertake to solve the problems affecting this country, to hasten the consideration of unemployment relief. Let us see whether or not we can do what we asked others to do 13 or 14 years ago and be soldiers enough to have a couple of tariff horses shot from under us in this battle to save the country from defeat.

I want to show that the condition of the oil industry is due to the large production which has come from the new fields. Strange to say, in support of my contention, I ask that there may be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks an article from the Oil and Gas Journal entitled "East Texas Depresses Whole Industry. Production of Crude Oil in United States Last Year Held Down Everywhere Else by Continued Proration."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the Oil and Gas Journal, January 28, 1932]

EAST TEXAS DEPRESSED WHOLE INDUSTRY—PRODUCTION OF CRUDE OIL IN UNITED STATES LAST YEAR HELD DOWN EVERYWHERE ELSE BY CONTINUED PRORATION

By James McIntyre

It has been estimated by oil men, whose opinion is worth consideration, that the oil fields of the United States could produce 5,000,000 barrels a day if there was reason for such an enormous crude-oil output. This figure is not fantastic by any means. With Texas, California, Oklahoma, and Kansas removing all restrictions, and with drilling operations up to normal, or at the rate of 15,000 new oil wells in a year, it would easily be possible for the country to produce 5,000,000 barrels per day for a limited but considerable period. Last year, however, only 6,703 new oil wells were drilled in this country and production was held to 845,803,454 barrels, an average of 2,317,270 barrels per day, or 46 per cent of its easily attained potential.

With the exception of Texas, New Mexico, and Michigan, every State producing oil showed a decline compared with the production of 1930. Here is how and where production increased or decreased last year, compared with the totals for the year 1930:

Increased production	Barrels
Texas	36,216,473
New Mexico	4,982,968
Michigan	144,000
Total increase	41,343,441
Decreased production
California	39,262,867
Oklahoma	40,410,743
Arkansas	4,488,375
Kansas	3,167,009
Wyoming	3,047,745

	Barrels
Louisiana	1,024,734
Illinois	934,000
Pennsylvania	1,056,000
Ohio	1,165,000
Kentucky	972,000
West Virginia	634,000
Montana	356,607
New York	459,000
Colorado	130,777
Indiana	159,000
Tennessee	13,000
Total decline	97,280,857
Net decline in United States	55,937,416

EAST TEXAS RESPONSIBLE

Texas' big increase in production may be altogether attributed to the east central and east Texas divisions, as all the other Texas divisions showed marked decreases in their crude output as compared with the previous year.

Curtailment of production in one form or another was practiced in every State producing oil. A vast number of small wells were shut in a part of the time last year inside and outside the prorated States, because it did not pay to operate them at the existing crude oil prices, and the number of wells reported as producing at the close of the year was only 299,104, as compared with 327,268 wells on production at the close of 1930. A portion of the wells shown in the declining figures were abandoned altogether. The others were kept idle awaiting higher prices. As a result, the average production per well remained about the same in both years, 7.75 barrels per day per well last year and 7.60 barrels per day per well the year before.

EAST TEXAS CRUDE FLOOD

The east Texas field, made up of the Joiner, Kilgore, and Longview pools, did more to bring stagnation to the general oil industry than any other one thing. Discovered in the fall of 1930, at a time when the industry was trying to control an overproduction from California pools, Oklahoma City and Seminole in Oklahoma and several western Texas pools and the Van field in east central Texas, the east Texas field did not assume importance until, following the opening of the Joiner pool, the Longview and Kilgore pools were discovered, and it became definitely known that a great field had been opened. In the annual review of 1930 the Oil and Gas Journal headed its story of this field with the words, "May Be the World's Largest Oil Field," but some of the large oil companies were skeptical and did not try to get acreage until all three of the pools had been opened. The vast area, occupying about 120,000 acres, was solidly leased up, mostly by small operators and by newcomers in the business, among whom were numerous promoters of stock-selling schemes. So much of the acreage was held in small parcels, ranging all the way from 1 acre upwards, and its ownership was so diversified, that it was impossible to bring about an orderly development, and production began to mount rapidly after February.

When the big companies did get in by purchasing the interests of many of the "little fellows," there was not much improvement in the drilling situation.

Daily production in February averaged 26,062 barrels; in March, 93,579 barrels; in April, 249,325 barrels, continuing upward until it reached a 1-day peak in August exceeding 1,000,000 barrels, with an average for the whole month of August of 542,381 barrels, brought down by the application of martial law in the field by order of Governor Sterling.

SMALL FINANCIAL RETURN

Meanwhile the price of east Texas crude, which at first was above $1 per barrel, dropped by degrees to an average of 13 cents per barrel in the week ending August 12. The enforced curtailment of production by the governor's order affected the price of crude favorably, and it advanced to an average of 54 cents in the week ending September 2, to 66 cents in the week ending September 9, and to 82 cents as an average price in the week ending November 2, which price maintained to the end of the year.

Small operators and royalty owners, who for months objected strenuously to any curtailment of drilling or production, abandoned their attitude when they found that they could get much more money for much less oil and still retain part of their product in the ground. For example, the producers and royalty owners received $626,465 for 4,818,961 barrels of oil produced in the week ending August 12, while in the last week in December they received $1,669,680 for 2,036,195 barrels of oil. Thus they received about two and one-half times as much money for less than half the quantity of crude.

BIG FIRST YEAR OUTPUT

In 1930 the Joiner pool in Rusk County produced only 29,122 barrels, its total for October, November, and December. There was no other production in east Texas. In 1931 Joiner produced 37,932,810 barrels; Kilgore, 43,537,815 barrels; and Longview, 26,257,287 barrels. The combined fields produced 107,727,912 barrels, or an average over the entire year of 295,145 barrels per day. How much this field could have produced is a question. In the last half of the year it could easily have produced the capacity of the pipe lines and railroad facilities available at the time and not been opened to its limit. In the biggest calendar year experienced by the Seminole field (comprising then five pools) it produced 135,951,098 barrels, and its biggest production for 12 months, or from March 1, 1927, to February 28, 1928, was 141,491,000 barrels. Seminole was the largest high-grade oil producer the country had known up to its time. East Texas can easily exceed the best 12-month record of which Seminole was capable, and owing to its immense productive acreage, estimated now at about 90,000 acres, it is believed it could exceed the best 12-month production of which any other high-grade field in the United States is capable, although there may be Californians who will dispute this in favor of Kettleman Hills.

Whatever may be the fate of enforced proration by the Texas State government, it is considered unlikely that the producers of east Texas would permit the field to run wild as it was threatening to do when Governor Sterling intervened last summer. The phantom of 5 and 10 cent oil would be enough to stiffen them into voluntary action to prevent overproduction.

THE VAN POOL'S BIG SHOWING

The east central Texas area, or Mexia fault field, developed nothing new of importance in 1931 in the way of discoveries, but the Van field, in Van Zandt County, showed a very considerable increase in oil production, even though it was held back by unitization and voluntary curtailment. The Van field has a large actual potential production, but it was kept down to an average well below 50,000 barrels per day through the year. Its total production of 15,542,023 barrels in 1931 was an increase of 8,011,801 barrels over its production of 7,530,222 barrels in 1930. The whole area produced 19,164,902 barrels last year. Of this, the once famous Mexia field produced only 1,186,770 barrels and Powell 1,362,278 barrrels. Mexia was down to 2,989 barrels per day in December and Powell to 2,461 barrels. The whole division produced 13,168,608 barrels in 1930 and Van's big production increased it by 5,996,294 barrels last year.

OLDER TEXAS FIELDS SLUMP

The north Texas, or Wichita Falls field, dropped in production from 32,299,098 barrels in 1930 to 21,850,878 barrels in 1931. Wichita County, where the Burkburnett, Electra, K-M-A, and Iowa Park fields are located, dropped from 8,875,852 barrels to 6,644,987 barrels. Archer County fell off from 6,023,760 barrels to 4,384,656 barrels; Wilbarger County slumped from 7,867,089 barrels to 4,167,000 barrels, and Young County from 5,229,460 barrels to 4,231,600 barrels. Those are the major producing areas in the districts. The lesser fields showed losses and gains, but they were of little consequence in the general picture. The whole area declined 10,448,220 barrels in production in 1931.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I have read heretofore from both party platforms to show that both the parties are against the proposed tariff on oil. What a lot of hypocrites we are, what a lot of scoundrels we are to go out upon a lot of unsuspecting people and solicit their suffrage upon our word and then come here and repudiate it, once we have gained power!

Mr. President, I marvel at the patience of the good people of this land and at the things they take from us, the injustices that we do them, knowing they are injustices, because we are afraid of making Mr. John Brown, who owns a big copper mine, or Mr. Bill Smith, who owns a big oil field, a little angry. We will go through it again; and we will go up to Chicago, all of us, and we will write another mass of glittering words; spellbinders will go out all over the country, saying, "Put our party in power and we will lift this country out of the slough of despond," and then we will come here and betray them, as we have done over and over again in many cases so far as our pledged word is concerned.

I hope, Mr. President, that my friend from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] will not go out as the farmers' friend next fall when he is a candidate for reelection and still claim to be his friend when he has voted a 2½-cent a gallon tax on every farmer and citizen of his State, not for the use of the Government, but for the benefit of the 20 large oil companies, which at this hour have in their pipe lines a year's supply of oil without the necessity of buying a gill. And the next time he gives the railroads what, in many cases, is coming to them, I hope he will not overlook his vote on the oil tax, if he intends to vote for it, which I doubt very much, for I can not conceive him doing it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. Am I to infer from the Senator's remarks that he is coming over to my side on the railroad question?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am coming over to the Senator's side a little, and I want to know if the Senator is still there when I get there. [Laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. BROOKHART. I shall be there.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There must be no demonstrations in the galleries.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to get there and find the Senator and Wall Street have gone out on a spree. [Laughter.]

Who are the users of this oil? The Navy alone will pay $8,500,000 more a year for the oil which its ships use than it pays now. That amount is $3,500,000 more than the Government will get out of such a tax, even taking the figures the Senator from Utah has shown in his written report.

The Post Office Department uses large quantities of fuel oil; so that the small amount we are supposed to get out of this so-called tariff for revenue purposes will be more than absorbed in increased expenses which the Government will be forced to bear, and every Senator here knows it.

Now, I will show how the large corporations are going to collect this $486,000,000. I want the farmers of Iowa and Maryland and Nebraska and of every other State in the Union to know how the big oil companies are going to take this money out of their pockets. The big companies would be the chief beneficiaries of the proposed tariff and not the so-called independents, who produce less than one-half the country's crude oil. A score of the big companies own 90 per cent of the pipe lines; they own 73 per cent of the refining capacity; they own 85 per cent of the retail distributing facilities and practically all the storage facilities.

They have got a year's oil supply now in their pipe lines or in their production, and they do not have to buy a gill for a year. They can say to every independent producer who wants to sell his oil, "Take my price or wait one year before I buy a gill of it"; and in times like these no producer can wait more than 10 minutes to get the few dollars that the oil companies are going to pay.

The 20 large oil companies own 90 per cent of the 633,000,000 barrels of oil in storage at this hour. When this storage is reinventoried on a basis of 2½ cents a gallon increase on gasoline and one-half cent a gallon increase on fuel oil, we find an immediate profit to the 20 large oil companies of $500,000,000 which the American consumers will pay this year, and not a dollar of which will find its way into the Treasury of the United States.

I desire to put in the RECORD at this point some comments upon the Tariff Commission's report on the cost of production of oil at home and abroad. It has been misrepresented on this floor over and over again. Therefore I ask to have inserted in my remarks the report of the Tariffs Commission, which does not show that the difference in the cost of production in this country and abroad is $1.03 a barrel on oil generally, as has been claimed here over and over for it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

COMMENTS UPON THE TARIFF COMMISSION'S REPORT ON COST OF PRODUCTION AT HOME AND ABROAD

Last year before the Senate Committee on Commerce the remarkable argument was presented that there was not necessarily any relation between the price of crude and gasoline. This statement has been assiduously peddled by propagandists, circulated broadly through the press, and presented to Congress committees with the obvious intent of disarming the public mind in relation to the inevitable increase in the cost of gasoline.

The Federal Trade Commission, the American Petroleum Institute, and other competent and disinterested organizations have repeatedly shown its falsity.

Until their appearances this year before the Finance Committee and the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. Franklin and his associates have repeatedly argued that the price of fuel oil was too low, and that the purpose of the bill was to increase the price at the well. These statements have now been discarded and both the Finance Committee and the Ways and Means Committee this year were informed that the proposed tax would not affect the price of fuel oil to the consumer.

Last year crude oil was as low as 10 cents a barrel at the well—this year it is ranging around $1. A year ago Governor Murray of Oklahoma mobilized the militia to stop wasteful overproduction and proclaimed to the world that his ambition was to compel curtailment of production in the hope that oil would again sell at the well for $1. Governor Murray has realized his ambition, not through the barriers afforded by an embargo or a protective tariff, but through the oil-fashioned method of applying a little common sense to the end that the laws of supply and demand be respected.

Having completely failed to reverse the laws of trade by the remarkable premise that there is no connection between the price of crude and gasoline the proponents of this measure are now attempting to use the recent report of the Tariff Commission to establish their contention that there is a differential in favor of imported oils of $1.05 per barrel.

Any literate person could not knowingly make such mistakes as they have done. There is no such differential in favor of the importers. There is none at all. This phase of the controversy was discussed in considerable detail before the Finance Committee. It will be found in the testimony of Paul H. Harwood, pages 457–471 of the Finance Committee hearings:

"The Tariff Commission, in its report for the years 1927–1930, reports not a difference in cost of $1.03 per barrel, as alleged by Mr. Franklin, but of 46 cents, on the basis of 'like or similar products' as required by the tariff act (p. 3), but calls attention to three disparities in its calculation to the disadvantage of the Venezuelan product, each of which would, when properly determined and taken into account, reduce this difference in cost.

"1. It admits that in figuration of cost to produce crude it has applied to the foreign oil the same rate of interest and depreciation as applied to the domestic crude. It admits (p. 59) an adjustment of interest charges would increase the cost of foreign crude 5 cents per barrel.

"Adjustment of depreciation, recognizing that foreign crude is produced in tropical climates where destruction is rapid, would add another 5 cents per barrel.

"These items, properly taken into account, would lower the difference of 46 cents per barrel to 36 cents per barrel.

"2. It calls attention (p. 2, last paragraph) to the fact that while actual bare cost of transportation has been used to calculate the cost of landing Venezuelan oil on Atlantic seaboard, 49 cents per barrel has been used in calculating cost of landing domestic crude oil here, this being an average, not of cost of pipeline transport, but of actual published pipe-line charges. Interstate Commerce Commission's reports show that for 1930, the last year covered by this report, the ratio of operating expenses, taxes, and 6 per cent interest to operating revenue is 60 per cent.

"3. In its figuration of comparative values of yields from the two crudes the commission admits that the value of the gas and fuel-oil yield out of Venezuelan crude is much below that of the higher quality gas and fuel-oil yields out of domestic crudes. (It admits value of foreign yield is only 2.55 cents per gallon while domestic yield is worth 2.93 cents per gallon, a difference of 0.38 cent per gallon.) But it states that nevertheless it applied the higher domestic value to both crudes in calculation of total value of yields of both oils. The report states (p. 54):

"'The significance of any overvaluation of the gas and fuel oils from foreign crude is evident from the fact that these oils constitute considerably over 30 gallons of the product obtained from each barrel of crude (42 gallons) * * * there may be an overstatement of the value of the products from foreign crudes due to the method used, amounting to 10 to 15 cents per barrel, or even more.

"'The overvaluation of gas and fuel-oil derivatives in each barrel of foreign crude might then amount to 15 cents per barrel, which, subtracted from the remaining 16.4 cents, practically wipes out the remaining apparent advantage for Venezuelan crude oil.

"'Therefore the correct interpretation of the Tariff Commission's report for the year ending in 1930 is that there is no appreciable advantage in cost of Venezuelan crude, as compared with like or similar domestic products.

"'The supplemental report of the commission to the Ways and Means Committee, covering year 1931, shows still lower domestic costs due to the development of the cheaper but highly valuable crude of east Texas, and that the average domestic delivered cost at Atlantic points, without adjustment for lowered pine-line rates, has fallen 22 cents per barrel, or from $1.90, average for three years, to $1.68 per barrel.

"'Therefore, on the face of the two Tariff Commission's reports, there is no advantage in foreign crude costs; but on the contrary, domestic crudes are deliverable at Atlantic ports, value for value, at at least 20 cents a barrel under the foreign costs.'"

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I desire to put in the RECORD here a statement of the articles used by the farmer which are on the free list under the present protective tariff act of 1922:

Farm implements and machinery, building materials, fuels and lubricating oils, coal (anthracite and bituminous), coke, petroleum (crude); gasoline, kerosene, lubricating oil, composition fuel in which coal is the chief component material, fertilizer and fertilizer materials, and such articles.

I ask both parties, are you now going to take fuel oil and gasoline off the free list, after you have boasted all these years that you would not put a tariff on anything which was essential to the conduct of farming?

I desire to insert in the RECORD, to save time, some tables showing how an oil tariff will affect our foreign trade by taking the oil which is now coming into America and driving it in competition with the oil which we are exporting, so that if the imported oil is not sold here it will displace just that much American exported oil, and in the last analysis as much oil only will be sold from American wells as is now sold; so that the producer will not sell 1 gallon more than he now sells. I ask permission at this point to have these tables inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

HOW AN OIL TARIFF WILL AFFECT OUR FOREIGN TRADE

Our dwindling foreign commerce would be further injured. Venezuela and other countries trade their oil for American goods. If oil imports are excluded, this trade will go elsewhere. Further tariff reprisals from foreign countries would follow, like those provoked by the Hawley-Smoot tariff.

Exports of petroleum and its products in 1930 ranked third among major export groups, having a value of $494,000,000, or 13 per cent of all exports. Gasoline exports made up $250,640,000 of this total, an increase in volume, though a slightly smaller value than the year before.

Imports of all oils amounted to only 70 per cent of exports in quantity and 29 per cent in value. (Department of Commerce.)

Major oil companies operating in South America already are making or have made arrangements to divert production to European markets. European goods will be exchanged for this oil, to the detriment of American exporters.

The United States in 1930 imported crude oil and refined products valued at $143,600,000, of which Venezuela furnished $25,600,000, the Netherland East Indies $77,500,000 (South American oil), Colombia $19,800,000, and Mexico $9,800,000, a total of $132,700,000. (Tariff Commission Rept. 30, 1931, p. 113.)

In turn we sold to those countries in 1930:

Venezuela	$35,200,000
Netherland East Indies	36,000,000
Colombia	24,600,000
Mexico	112,600,000
This is a total of	208,400,000

The export business of the United States in petroleum and its products would be jeopardized by the tariff, and the same is true for coal, lumber, and copper.

The balance of exports over imports for these commodities in 1931 was (Journal of Commerce, May 6, 1932):

Petroleum and products	$177,758,000
Coal	54,984,000
Lumber, rough and sawed	23,820,000
Copper	6,003,000
Coke	3,494,000

Recent figures from the Department of Commerce show the extent of trade with those countries most affected by an oil tariff:

Mr. TYDINGS. I showed yesterday how this tariff would affect road building, which the farmer needs more than anything else. He is already taxed for a lot of road funds and for the State highways. It is proposed in this bill to increase the cost of the asphalt and the oils used in road building, so that he is going to get less for his road money than he has gotten heretofore. As that has already been inserted in the RECORD, I do not think I need put it in again.

I also want to put in the RECORD some quotations from the Federal Oil Conservation Board under the general heading, "Shall We Abandon Our Long-Standing Conservation Policy?" so ably expressed, so forcibly expressed, and so logically expressed by the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] yesterday; also, some quotations from President Coolidge. There was a day when the mention of that name was an open sesame through which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] would go as into a haven, where all cares were expelled and only prosperity resided.

I ask permission to have these short quotations, and so forth, inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SHALL WE ABANDON OUR LONG-STANDING CONSERVATION POLICY?

Since the war successive administrations have interested themselves in insuring for this country an adequate supply of oil for future needs. America produces and consumes, and has for many years, about two-thirds of the world's oil, although its known reserves are only about 18 per cent of the world's total.

The uncontrolled exploitation of an irreplaceable and essential natural resource several years ago brought demands for conservation, to be accomplished in two ways: (1) Control and restriction of domestic production and (2) acquisition and development of foreign sources of oil under American control.

American companies which had developed foreign fields supplied the Allies with the oil needed for victory in the World War. Again in 1920–21 foreign oil supplies tided the country over a period of shortage.

The country after the war realized the growing importance of oil in national defense, industry, and world-trade competition. The automotive industry was expanding, bringing increased demands for gasoline. Consumption was increasing much more rapidly than production and the exhaustion of domestic supplies was foreseen in the not distant future. This country had been slow to realize the necessity of supplementing its resources from outside, while other countries, notably Britain, had obtained extensive and valuable concessions throughout the world.

President Coolidge in 1924 set up a Federal Oil Conservation Board, with the Secretaries of War, Navy, Interior, and Commerce as members, to consider the problem of maintaining adequate oil supplies.

"It is even probable that the supremacy of nations may be determined by the possession of available petroleum and its products," he said at that time.

The board in its first report said:

"While the production of oil upon our own territory is obviously of first importance, yet in failure of adequate supplies the imports of oil are of vast amount. * * * The fields of Mexico and South America are of large yield and much promising geologic oil structure is as yet undrilled. That our companies should vigorously acquire and explore such fields is of first importance, not only as a source of future supply but supply under control of our own citizens. Our experience with the exploitation of our consumers by foreign-controlled sources of rubber, nitrate, potash, and other raw materials should be sufficient warning as to what we may expect if we shall become dependent upon foreign nations for our oil supplies."

Each subsequent report of the conservation board has reiterated this conviction. In 1929 we find this:

"The United States is exhausting its petroleum resources at a dangerous rate. * * * The depletion rate of our resources can be brought more into accord with that of foreign resources only in one way—by importing a greater quantity of crude petroleum. The present imports of Mexican and South American crude oil come largely from American operators, and, while not obtained from United States oil sands, they are the product of American engineering and enterprise. Cooperation in the development of foreign oil fields, through technical assistance and the further investment of American capital, would seem to be a logical conservation measure."

The Bureau of Mines in 1931 reported through the Secretary of the Interior to the Senate Commerce Committee:

"Foreign crude which is being imported into the United States is predominantly the output of American-owned and operated companies.

"* * * These American companies consistently receive the assistance of the United States Government in their efforts to explore and develop oil lands in foreign countries * * *.

"Having thus encouraged American oil companies to develop foreign oil production, in order that other nations would not control an undue share of the world's oil resources, it might be considered that there has been established an implied obligation to continue in the assistance of American companies engaged in foreign oil production, and that the restriction or refusal of admission to the United States of the oil so produced would be contrary to the encouragement which these companies have received while engaged in foreign oil exploration and development work."

This was in accord with the national policy which President Coolidge had defined in a public address in New York in April four years ago:

"Our country consumes vast quantities of oil and gasoline in its use of automobiles, gas engines, and oil-burning furnaces. If these products are to be kept within a reasonable price, which is very important to a great body of our citizens, our people who go abroad to develop and to increase supply ought to have the encouragement and support of our Government. The person and property of a citizen are a part of the general domain, even when abroad."

The importance attached to the acquisition of foreign oil lands by the State Department was shown by diplomatic correspondence after the war. There was a protracted and at times almost belligerent exchange of notes with Great Britain over the policy of that Government in attempting to exclude nationals of other countries from oil lands in domain under British control, and to secure for herself alone the right to exploit lands in mandated territories. There were also diplomatic conflicts in Central and South America over concessions; the State Department stood firmly in opposition to Mexican land laws, which it was held threatened American oil developments with confiscation.

Senator KEY PITTMAN in 1920 went so far as to propose a Government-owned oil corporation which would enter competition with the British and others. The British then were boasting that they already had acquired a third or a half of the world's oil lands and that the United States was permanently at a disadvantage.

Last year a tariff on oil was opposed by members of the Senate Finance Committee and Secretary Wilbur, who favored free entry as a means of conservation. Wilbur was quoted as saying:

"In the future the country with the oil will dominate civilization. In it will be centered the wealth. America must conserve her supply. If we waste our oil reserves now we will pay foreign countries through the nose for every barrel we import later. If I were landlord of this country I would see that we used as much imported oil as possible and let the other fellow waste his reserves."

During the last three years there has been an apparent plethora of oil, due to overexpansion and uncontrolled output and not to imports, which have comprised only 10 per cent of the total supply. Oklahoma, Texas, California, Kansas, and other States have intervened to check this overproduction, and in Oklahoma and Texas the fields were brought under control only by the use of military force.

The demoralization of the oil industry in this country, in fact, was largely brought about by the riotous exploitation of the fabulously rich east Texas field in 1930–31. The Oil and Gas Journal for January 28, 1932 (p. 56) captions a leading article:

"East Texas depressed whole industry—production of crude oil in United States last year held down everywhere else by continued proration."

The voluntary committee on petroleum economics reported to the Federal Conservation Board last year that curtailment was "in the nature of an emergency measure and should not be expected to provide a cure for the fundamental economic maladjustments existing in the petroleum industry." It added that the industry is overcapitalized and overdeveloped and "rests upon an unsound method of offset drilling."

Thus Congress is asked, through an embargo tariff, to put the petroleum industry on its feet and to make the public pay for the errors and excesses which it has not been able to correct for itself. It is asked to become party to the more rapid exhaustion of dwindling reserves and upset a wise and well-established national policy of long standing.

It is interesting to note how American companies operating abroad have replied to appeals for restricting output. During the years 1930–31 eastern production declined 10⅘ per cent. Mid-continent increased 2⅕ per cent; Gulf coast declined 17⅐ per cent; Rocky Mountain 13 per cent; California 17 per cent—and imports of all oils were curtailed by 19 per cent. (Bureau of Mines figures.) The mid-continent field, whence comes the most vociferous demands for a tariff, actually increased its output.

Consolidated for the country these figures show:

Year	Domestic production	Percentage decrease under preceding year	Percentage decrease under 1929	Imports	Percentage decrease under preceding year	Percentage decrease under 1929
1929	1,007,323,000			108,565,000
1930	898,011,000	10.85	10.85	105,618,000	2.71	2.71
1931	850,261,000	5.32	15.59	86,082,000	18.50	20.71

Mr. TYDINGS. Now, Mr. President, much to the surprise of everybody, so far as I am concerned, we are going to vote. I just want to say this in conclusion:

When this vote is taken a motion to reconsider is going to be made, no matter which side wins; and, after we have decided it, we are going to debate at a later date all over again whether or not we are going to keep in the bill the policy which we will shortly adopt. There are going to be amendments offered; and I now ask permission to offer 500 amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator does not need to have permission.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am asking whether I have to or not.

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

Mr. TYDINGS. I ask that they be printed and lie on the table, and that, if copper, lumber, coal, and oil are to receive consideration, these items, too, receive consideration; although I am frank to confess that I am willing to let my State's tariff needs, either higher or lower, go by the board and pass this tax bill now and reassure the country. That is my preference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment of the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. TYDINGS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Copeland	Hawes	Robinson, Ark.
Austin	Costigan	Hayden	Robinson, Ind.
Bailey	Couzens	Hebert	Schall
Bankhead	Cutting	Howell	Sheppard
Barbour	Davis	Hull	Shortridge

Caraway	Gore	Neely	Walsh, Mass.
Carey	Hale	Norbeck	Watson
Cohen	Harrison	Norris	Wheeler
Connally	Hastings	Nye	White
Coolidge	Hatfield	Oddie

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate to a request about to be submitted and will take the privilege of making a brief statement before submitting it.

It is manifest that a large number of Senators feel that tariff items should not be included in this bill. The course of the debate, in so far as it has proceeded, indicates that it may be indefinitely prolonged and the passage of the revenue bill deferred to the detriment of the country.

In the hope that the request I am about to make may tend to clarify the atmosphere and to bring about a prompt conclusion, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to make the motion and that the Senate proceed without further debate to vote upon a motion to strike from the bill all tariff items.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, appreciating, I believe, the great and extreme importance of the matter which is now before the Senate, I have endeavored to approach it with an impartial and an unbiased and open mind, and have listened with attention and interest to a very large proportion of the debate upon the subject.

Mr. President, I come from a State in which great as it is and situated as it is, every interest upon every side of these items which are now under consideration is represented. We have in the State of Illinois, from which I come, the greatest bituminous-coal region in all the world. There the miners and operators have been in distress, not for months, but for years, and I know something of the misery, the poverty, the want, and the care which have confronted all those engaged as operators or as laborers in that once great industry.

We have in Illinois oil fields of some consequence and moment. While we do not have lumber interests or forests in our State, or copper mines in our State, there are great financial institutions centered in Chicago and in the other large cities of our Commonwealth in which large holdings, and the ownership of copper mines and lumber companies, are centered. We also have within the State more than seven and a half million of the ordinary, common people, who will be affected by the action of this body.

I have looked at this situation as carefully and as intelligently as I have been able to, and I have looked about the country, and have seen this critical time in America. Nothing can parallel it in its extremity, in the terrific importance of events, and in the crisis which confronts us—nothing, at least, since the dark days of the War between the States.

Everyone who is a student of affairs knows that even in the direst times of the World War America was in no such crisis as she is in to-day. I say, as was said by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], that every man in this body should be big enough and brave enough and strong enough to rise above sectional and State lines, and think, for once, to-day, only of his Nation, and the people, wherever they be, in every section of our land.

Parties mean nothing in this crisis; and I am glad that there is in America a man so courageous and so intelligent and so wise as the leader of the Democratic Party, the last candidate of the Democratic Party for the Presidency of the United States, former Governor Smith, of New York, who, by his great speech within the last few days, has reared himself to a point in the esteem of sound-thinking Americans which is second almost to that of no man in the Republic, within or out of public office; a man big enough and brave enough and unselfish enough to say to the American people the things which his brain and his heart led him to believe were for the best interests of America. We here should follow his example. We should disregard political and selfish ends. What honor is there to any of us if we cast our votes to-day upon this matter, so vital to our country, influenced by partisan or selfish political purposes, or for political advantage?

Much has been said about those upon whom should rest the burden of the imposition of these tariff rates in this bill, if they are finally inserted in the bill; and, strange to say, the whole debate has proceeded upon the theory, almost unchallenged, that we are asked to do a thing here which, when it goes back to the country and the country has reflected upon it, will be looked upon, not as an honor to its sponsors but as a disgrace and a shame to those who fathered it. Upon one side of the aisle and then the other the question is advanced as to which party shall bear most of the burden of the shame which will come upon us if we insert into this revenue bill these tariff items.

I approach this matter as one who voted for a tariff on oil when it was proposed during the consideration of the last tariff bill enacted. I thought the oil people made a good case. I listened to the arguments of the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and he convinced me that they were entitled to a tariff on oil in that tariff bill. I began voting with him, I think, at a dollar a barrel, voted with him then at 80 cents, then at 60 cents, and on down, five or six times, until it was apparent that no tariff upon oil would be inserted in the bill. Then, and only then, when the case was hopeless, did I quit voting for a tariff upon oil. So I say I do not approach the subject as one biased in mind.

I have come to the conclusion, Mr. President, that the country demands and requires now—not months from now, but soon—the passage of this revenue bill. With the whole country tottering on the brink of a great and bottomless precipice, we need to attempt to balance the Budget, to sustain the financial credit of the country, to protect us from within and from without.

We are confronted here with a situation more serious because we have neglected in the Congress of the United States our first imperative duty, which was to cut drastically the expenditures of the Federal Government. Everybody else has been cutting expenses. All lines of industry, all lines—mercantile, manufacturing, transportation, finance, every line of endeavor, except the operation of our governments, local, State, and Federal—have been cutting expenses. But we sit here idly, refusing this item and the other item of economy, and, after the whole program has been argued day after day and week after week, we will submit to the people of the country, the taxpayers of the country, a most pitiful and puny accomplishment in the way of economy.

We talk about mergers and consolidations of the departments of the Government when we should be talking about cutting them off, abolishing them, curtailing and preventing the interference of Federal and State officials in private business enterprise.

The great and growing army of Federal employees and State employees, all functioning at the expense of the overburdened, the almost destroyed taxpayers, must be stopped. The time will come—it will not come at this session, but it will come—when we will return to Illinois, to California, to Maine, to the States of the South, and all over the country, and meet the taxpayers, our constituents, face to face, and learn of their disasters, of their sorrows, of their bankruptcies, and we will come back here then—those of us who are allowed to return to Washington—chastened in spirit, not in the same attitude of mind we are in now, but fresh from the people who pay the taxes, bankrupt and homeless, hungry and starving. Then, and only then, I predict, will the American Congress do that which is so plainly its imperative and pressing duty, cut off these expenses, abolish commissions, bureaus, and the other activitities which we can abolish, and go back to the primary functions of the Federal Government. There will then be some hope in America for industry and for business and for the individual.

We are not going to do that now; it can not be accomplished, because when one item comes up, while everybody is for the general theory of great economy—all are for it—if we touch an item people spring up, as has been said, like locusts—yes, like mushrooms—from every section of the land with arguments as to why that item should be preserved in the appropriation bill. We have to go back to our people. We will be back here in December, and there will be a different story then.

I said two months ago in this body that I believed that the soundest thing and the most popular thing the President of the United States could do would be to send the word out to his followers in this land and in the Congress that drastic and severe reductions must be made forthwith in the expenditures of the Federal Government, and I am convinced that there would have been great effect in the Congress. But it is coming next December or next January. In the meantime we must go on and raise the revenue to run this Government, and, as has been said here, there is not very much time before us if it is to be done before the end of the fiscal year.

Think of it a deficit of $3,000,000,000; growing, growing, growing every day, expenses not reduced, but receipts reduced, shrinking, diminishing every hour of every day.

Talk about Nero sitting by idly and fiddling while Rome burned! We have in the American Congress not a fiddler but a jazz band performing while America is burning.

I sat here the other day, as we all did, and heard the spirited argument for and against a tax upon beer, and the technical and interesting and invigorating descriptions of the effects which beverages of certain alcoholic contents would have. We saw that proposal voted down in this body at a time when America is needing money as she never did before by a vote of almost 3 to 1, and within a few moments, practically without discussion, we saw placed upon wort, out of which nothing can be made except intoxicating beer, a heavy and substantial tax, Senators on both sides of the aisle, Democrats and Republicans, wet and dry, raising their voices in unison when the question was put, and voting "aye" unanimously. I say there is no consistency in that situation. The time will have to come when this question will be squarely and courageously met. I believe, after all the discussion in the House on the proposed sales tax—I happened to be over there when the vote was taken—that it is coming soon.

I may be wrong, of course, but I think we should go back; and I am not so sure but what we will return before this bill is finally passed to reasonable income taxes, reasonable inheritance and gift taxes, reasonable excess-profits taxes—if we ever have any profits again—and that we will join with those a fair and reasonable sales tax, a thing which will not then be an unreasonable burden upon anybody in the country and from which we can receive the necessary revenue to operate the Government without destroying and crushing any of our businesses, our industries, or our individual citizens.

I know what will happen here. Why is it? What argument can be advanced which says that we will open this revenue measure and make a tariff measure out of it? We will revise the tariff, but we will revise it only upon four or five items. In my judgment, there is no intellectual honesty in such a proposal. I mean that it is scarcely fair to say to every industry in the country except four or five that "We will revise the tariff upon those four or five ailing industries; but while you need it as badly as they do, we will refuse you even consideration." We can not do those things in America. We have coal and oil in Illinois, of course, and these other things, but what argument can I advance to my people to justify a vote to revise the tariff on oil and lumber and coal and copper but deny them the opportunity to be heard on their other interests? It is not fair; it is not right; it is not just.

There are many industries, not to be counted upon the four fingers of one hand, which need help. We can not count them upon the fingers on all the hands in the Senate. They are in just as desperate condition as are coal and oil and lumber and copper. There is no controversy about it. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], with whom I sometimes disagree, is going to offer an amendment to protect the growers of corn through a tariff upon blackstrap molasses. Have not the corn growers of my State, with their farms being sold out, their homes foreclosed, their stock carried away by the sheriff, the same right to be considered here as has the operator of a copper mine or the operator of a coal mine or the owner of the other favored industries which are to be considered here? What can I say to the farmers of my State if they ask me, "Why did you vote for these four items and against all others? Why did you penalize me?" What honest thing can I say to them? I know of no reply that I can make.

Logrolling? It is said there is logrolling. I am not shocked or startled at that. I do not doubt that there was much of it. The distinguished senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has referred to logrolling, and I think if there is an able lumberjack in this whole body it is the distinguished senior Senator from Wisconsin, so I assume he spoke whereof he knows. Perhaps that is all right. I am not complaining about it. I say we can not do these things and justify our action to the people. I fear that we can not open up this revenue bill and make a tariff bill out of it and consider item after item after item, scores and scores of them, and finish here before the beginning of the next regular session of Congress. It took 16 months to consider the last tariff bill. Why should we believe it would take any less time in the consideration of the matter now except that the next session comes in December?

I am humble in my opinion and not trying to impress it upon anyone except in the ordinary and reasonable way, but I think we should proceed now to carry on the measure as a revenue measure, to strike out all the amendments pertaining to the tariff, to go on with the revenue measure as rapidly as possible, and let the country know that pretty soon they will have a tax bill of some kind, so they can provide accordingly. That is my judgment as to what should be done. We are worrying about getting away for the conventions. I think it would be a ludicrous thing for either party, first the Republican Party and then the Democratic Party, their Members here in Congress, to adjourn with 10,000,000 people in want, with industry and finance and all our interests paralyzed, to desert the people here, to cease our efforts at least to solve these problems, and go to Chicago and write lengthy and glowing and glorious laudatory planks in the platforms of our efforts to save the common people and our friends in America. Let us stay here until this revenue bill is enacted, until the appropriation bills are enacted, until emergency relief measures are provided, and then, Republicans and Democrats alike, we can proceed home and meet our people fairly and squarely with the consciousness of having at least attempted to serve our people and do our duty.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield at any moment for a roll call on the pending amendment. I will yield at any moment for a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on all tariff amendments to the bill, to vote on all tariff amendments that may be proposed, to vote on all tariff items, without debate and without adjournment.

Mr. President, I do not agree with those who think that the President of the United States should intervene in this tariff controversy. There are some Senators who insist that the President ought to intervene and that he ought to intervene on the side of the Standard Oil Co., that he ought to intervene against the people of the United States. Sir, I am not the keeper of the king's conscience. The President of the United States has a constitutional right to submit in writing his recommendations concerning legislation to the Congress. Any President of any party who goes farther than that, who violates the spirit and the form of our institutions, separated into the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, any President who undertakes to exercise his power and his prestige, any President who undertakes to exert pressure upon the Congress of the United States, either to enact or to defeat legislation, ought to be impeached.

Mr. President, I shall not undertake to decide whether the tariff duties in this bill are revenue rates or protective rates. Many protective rates raise more or less revenue. Many revenue rates yield more or less protection. I do not intend to discuss that point. The Democratic convention in Oklahoma declared in favor of a tariff on oil. That plank was inserted in our platform without my contrivance, my connivance, or my consent. I accepted it, however, as an imperative mandate, and I pledged myself to support that declaration in good faith. I have attempted to keep the faith. I am not a protectionist. I do not profess to be; I do not pretend to be. I made that statement without reserve in the presence of a convention of the independent oil producers of the United States. I am obeying the behest of my master; I am acting rather as a delegate than as a representative.

It happens that my valued friend from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] represents a great Commonwealth, in which is situated the Pan American Refining Co. It happens that that company has large concessions in Venezuela, is one of the largest oil producers in Venezuela, is one of the largest oil importers into the United States, and that its imported crude oil is refined in the State of Maryland. As I am, so is the Senator from Maryland, representing his constituents, as he has the right to do. I only question his right to identify the interests of the Pan American Petroleum Co. with the general welfare of all the people of the United States.

I agree with those who insist that we should balance the Budget. That I regard as our immediate duty. That I regard as our supreme duty. I desire to expedite the discharge of that duty.

Mr. President, this tariff controversy can not be charged to the Senate of the United States; neither can it be charged to the Finance Committee of the Senate. This quarrel is not of our choosing. Under the Constitution of the United States the House of Representatives is vested with the power to originate all revenue measures. That power was vested in the House, not in the Senate; the House represents the people in this country and the purse strings were for that reason placed in the hands of the House. The House of Representatives, in the discharge of its constitutional duty, inserted in the pending measure a tariff on oil and a tariff on coal. The amendments incorporating those items were adopted by an overwhelming majority of the House. The House laid this measure on the doorsteps of the Senate.

Senators who are espousing speed, I think, are courting delay if they hurl defiance at the House of Representatives and eliminate coal and oil from this measure. That will not stop a tariff controversy; that will start one with the House of Representatives. I do not believe the House would recede. I have never doubted that expedition in this crisis recommends acquiescence at least in the tariff items inserted in this measure by the House. The Senate committee, after deliberate consideration, inserted two other tariff items. I do not doubt that expedition at least recommends the acceptance of those items.

Mr. President, I think that entirely too much emphasis has been laid upon the fact that these are tariff items inserted in a revenue measure. That point has been insisted upon as if, indeed, it were fundamental, as if there were something in the nature of things which made it repugnant to include tariff items and revenue items in one and the same measure. I think that is a false emphasis. Mr. President, our entire income-tax system was originated in a tariff measure. The Underwood-Simmons measure, which was enacted in 1913, a tariff measure comprehending three or four thousand tariff items, included our first legislation imposing a tax upon incomes; the high and signal credit for that service belonged more to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] than to any other Member of either House of Congress. I happened to be a member of the subcommittee of the Finance Committee which handled the income tax legislation in that measure. That provision was in the handwriting of the Senator from Tennessee; and I have joined his legion of admirers in rendering him tribute for that splendid service. I had no thought that he had violated any principle or any rule of taste or propriety in the insertion of an income tax in a tariff measure. It reminds me of the house fly that lit upon the dome of St. Peters Cathedral, and, discovering a speck of mildew, it was so shocked, it was so horrified that it lost sight of the dazzling splendor of that gilded dome.

We should not pass this measure, it is contended, because it contains tariff items. Whence comes this supersensitive objection to a union which has been sanctioned, if not consecrated, in the legislative annals of this Congress?

In Lilliputia the fundamental issue between the political parties was the question as to whether an egg should be broken at the big end or at the little end. That controversy typifies this dispute about the inclusion of tariff items in a revenue measure.

No, Mr. President; whether or not tariff items shall be inserted in a revenue measure is not the issue here now joined. The issue is far deeper, is far more significant; the issue is shall this measure serve the Standard Oil Trust or shall it serve the independent oil producers of this country. That is the issue joined here to-day, whether Senators choose or not.

I shall not embark on a discussion of the economic effect of a protective tariff. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] on yesterday made an impressive argument upon that subject and insisted that a protective tariff on oil would enhance the price of oil to the consumer. Can a protectionist be heard to make that argument? Mr. President, we live under a protective system; we live under a protective-tariff system. Why, then, should oil be an outcast? We are either living or dying under a protective-tariff administration. Can the argument be heard from the lips of a protectionist that a protective duty enhances the price of the article protected?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GORE. I would rather not yield at this time, if the Senator pleases.

Mr. SMITH. Very well.

Mr. GORE. If that be a valid argument against any protective-tariff duty, then it is a valid argument against all protective-tariff duties. If I were a protectionist, as I am not, I would try to hold fast to the maxim: "If protection be a blessing, let everybody share it; if protection be a burden, let everybody bear it."

But I do not intend to embark upon that discussion. I can not underwrite the future; I can not underwrite the consequences of the pending legislation.

With it the independents may not survive. Without it they are almost certain to perish.

I do know that apart from that argument there are only four other arguments against the adoption of the proposed tariff on oil. First, the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey; second, the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana; third, the Gulf Oil Co.; and fourth, the Royal Dutch Oil Co. Those are the four arguments against this proposal, and, whether we would or not, we must choose this day whether we will serve God or whether we will serve Baal; we must choose which we will serve.

Mr. President, those familiar with the economic and legislative history of this country know that it required a generation to secure the enactment of laws to restrain the power of the trusts and monopolies in this country. The Standard Oil Co. had its genesis about the year 1870. The South Improvement Co. was organized on the 2d of January, 1872. That was the predecessor of the Standard Oil Co.—the Standard Oil Trust. Even in that distant day it arranged with the Pennsylvania, the Erie, and the New York Central Railroads for a rebate of from 40 cents to $3.07 a barrel on oil transported by any of those railway lines. Its record was one of defiance toward the rights of the people and toward the laws of the land. The officers and directors of that concern were indicted for blowing up the plant of their competitors; they were indicted for murder. But I do not mean to rifle the tomb or resurrect the ghost of the dead past.

The Standard Oil Co. was organized as a trust in 1882, and not until 1890 did public opinion prevail upon the Congress of the United States to enact legislation to curb this mighty monopoly and to safeguard the rights of the people against its tyranny and its oppression. The Standard Oil Trust was the actuating cause of the enactment of the Sherman antitrust law in the year 1890. It required the efforts and the exertions of another generation, through the assistance of the executive department prosecuting the Standard Oil Trust, finally to secure a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States adjudging that organization to be a monopoly and ordering its dissolution. It was dissolved on May 15, 1911. It resolved into its constituent parts some 30 different concerns having been adjudged to be participants in the trust.

I have sometimes wondered whether the Standard Oil Co. in that dissolution did not typify the fabled jointed snake. I know that southern Senators, at least, heard at their nurse's knee of the fabulous jointed snake. Strike it and it would fly to pieces; leave it alone and the several joints would seek each other out and reunite themselves and form the original serpent once again.

I sometimes wonder if that does not typify the history of the Standard Oil concerns of this country subsequent to the decision of the United States Supreme Court dissolving that organization. Its spirit, if not its body, still survives; and this statement is abundantly proven by the celebrated report submitted to the Senate by the late Robert M. La Follette, sr., of Wisconsin. Here, in this place which he honored, I honor his memory. He was the friend of the people. He was the enemy of their enemies. He held true to that character without variableness or the shadow of turning.

In this report he divided the oil interests of this country into two distinct factions, I may say. On the one hand he arrayed the Standard Oil Trust and its former subsidiaries, still allies and associates. On the other hand, and in express terms, he segregated the independent oil producers of this country; and, as all who knew him would expect, he expressed the profoundest solicitude for the preservation of the independent oil producers against the insidious and oppressive measures of the Standard Oil group. He insisted upon their preservation in behalf of the people.

Mr. President, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD several quotations from this La Follette report. There will be other insertions which I shall wish to make, and I should like to reserve the right now, so as not to interrupt myself or the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHEELER in the chair). Without objection, the matter referred to will be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SUGGESTED REMEDIES

It must be obvious from the facts set forth in this report that the business can not go on as at present organized and conducted. It is essential to the life of the industry and vital to the public also that neither the public nor the small independent producers and refiners shall be left as at present to the mercy of a combination which advances or depresses prices as it pleases. Unless some means can be found to prevent the manipulation of prices by the large companies, and particularly the Standard group, it is as certain as any future event can be that gasoline prices in the near future will be so advanced as to put gasoline beyond the reach of the public generally as a motor fuel. Great as the capital invested in the business has become, important as the business is to thousands who are engaged in it and to other thousands who receive dividends from it, there is a still more important interest to be reckoned with, and that is the interest of the public. Petroleum and its products have become an absolute necessity.

* * * * * * *

It is to be remembered that the decree of the Supreme Court quoted in an early portion of this report forbids any "implied" contract or agreement, as well as an express one, to arbitrarily fix prices or to restrain trade. The facts developed in this investigation tend strongly to show the existence of such an agreement. A more complete investigation, we believe, will reveal additional evidence tending to support such a charge. If the facts warrant, after a searching investigation, all the parties to such agreement should be cited before the court for contempt of the decree made when the dissolution of the Standard Oil Trust was directed by the court.

* * * * * * *

If the independent operators in the oil industry could be given an equal opportunity with the Standard companies, there is strong reason to believe that they would be able to restore and maintain healthy competition. The Standard Oil companies are largely uneconomical organizations; most of them are burdened with parasitical subsidiaries which serve no good purpose, but add greatly to the expense of the companies. The attention of those companies has not been directed toward economy of management or conservation of crude oil and its products, but rather toward combinations and practices which would increase the volume of their business without regard to the public interest or the rights of others engaged in the business.

* * * * * * *

It is not expected that these remedies will immediately correct all the distressing conditions existing in the oil industry, but it is believed that they will go far toward accomplishing that purpose and do much to break the monopoly control of the business now existing. They will give the independent operators in the business an opportunity to compete on more nearly equal terms with the great Standard companies which now dominate the industry, and will protect the public from extortionate prices.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, when the United States Supreme Court decreed the dissolution of the Standard Oil Co. it was acclaimed throughout this country as a great triumph over the trusts. It was acclaimed as an emancipation of the people, as an emancipation of the common man from the tyranny of the trusts. It was said that after all popular government could assert its sovereignty and the sovereignty of the people over their allied enemies.

What happened? Private capital had been hesitant to enter into the oil industry in this country on account of the dominance of the Standard Oil monopoly. Private capital was willing to assume the risks of the industry—and the oil industry is nothing but a calculus of risks. It is founded upon risk, builded upon chance, erected upon the law of averages—the law of probabilities. The drilling of every oil well is a gamble, and yet it has grown to be the third largest industry in the United States.

When the Supreme Court dissolved the Standard Oil Trust private capital regarded that as an invitation on the part of its Government to enter into the oil industry, which theretofore had been a forbidden land. Private capital and private enterprise, remembering that the legislative department had enacted a law against trust and monopolies, remembering that the executive department had led a long fight in prosecution of trusts and monopolies, and remembering that the Supreme Court of the United States had sentenced this monopoly to death, embarked upon this hazardous enterprise.

Prior to the crash it is estimated that twelve billions of capital had been embarked in the oil business in this country. Some five or six billions of that was ventured by private enterprise, by concerns distinguished from the Standard Oil Co. and its survivors, invited by their Government, guaranteed by their Government that they need not fear future molestation at the hands of this monopoly which had been subjected to judicial execution. So we have billions of capital invested in the oil business to-day that entered on the assurance of their Government that they would be protected and that are now relying upon their Government to make good that protection and that assurance.

Not only that, Mr. President, but about that time a crusade was begun in this country to preserve our natural resources, particularly our oil resources. They were narrowly limited. We were threatened with famine. The liberal and optimistic prophets said, "Our resources might serve us for a quarter of a century." The conservative and pessimistic prophets said that they would serve our needs for six limited years and that then we might expect to face a famine.

The oil industry, with a spirit of enterprise unexampled in the history of our race, set itself to devise new ways and means for the detection and the discovery of oil in order to supply the economic and the social needs of their threatened country. Science, guided by inventive genius, inspired and financed by private capital, led to new methods, known as the geophysical methods, the torsion balance, and other methods for detecting reservoirs of oil down under the ground. Prior to that time they were limited to the natural eye and to surface indications where nature had left proof of her frolics and had left signs of her buried treasures.

As a result of that campaign new methods were devised, new resources were discovered, and the oil industry itself has been overwhelmed by the hidden treasure which it has discovered and has impressed into the service of mankind. They searched the hidden places of nature, and made her render up not only her secrets but her treasures; and the oil industry is now struggling beneath the deluge raised by its own efforts to serve not itself alone but to serve society and to protect the race against a threatened famine.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and I believe the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], complain that overproduction is the real grief of the oil industry to-day.

Mr. President, overproduction may have commenced the grief of the oil industry back in 1929; and I wish to say in passing that the oil industry in this country was in the throes, was in the depths of a depression peculiar to itself, shared only by the farmers of this country, when the terrific panic burst upon us in October, 1929. From that day till this the oil industry has been struggling against a double trouble, if I may use the phrase. From May, 1929, until the crash in October, 1929, the stock of independent oil companies had declined from 20 to 30 per cent, while other stocks were soaring. The stock of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey had gone straight up, in company with the general advance in prices, to $86 a share. When the crash came the independent oil producers and the farmers were the first and the worst to suffer. The stock of independent oil companies to-day is selling for about one-tenth of the peak price of 1929. The stock of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey is selling at about one-fourth of the peak price of 1929. This shows that the independent oil producers are unable to battle against heavy weather as is the Standard, the survivor of the ancient trust.

Mr. President, there are two characteristics of the oil business which render it impotent to protect itself in heavy weather as other industries may do for themselves.

A manufacturer can limit and control his output—can cease production entirely at will. The operator of an iron mine or a zinc mine can discontinue operations at will. That is not true of the oil industry. It is not the master of its own affairs.

There are two reasons, and I may tax the patience of the Senate to state them. Customs of the trade, in accordance with which the business is conducted, and in accordance with which alone the business can be conducted, is one. Oil companies do not own the land upon which they drill. The land is owned by the average citizen, generally by the farmer. The company pays a royalty to the owner of the land. These leases, commercial leases, generally run for five years, with a stipulation that a well will be drilled during that period, and that, pending drilling operations, rentals will be paid upon the land. It sometimes happens that large bonuses are paid in addition to the rentals.

The oil company must drill a well on its lease in order to hold the lease, whether it would do so or not, or else throw up the lease, or let it expire. The oil operator may drill a well on such a lease knowing that it is to his disadvantage and to the disadvantage of the industry as a whole. The oil man often has no choice.

I refer now to the other characteristic peculiar to the oil business. The oil operator in his lease stipulates to protect his lease by drilling offset wells. Suppose the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the author of the pending amendment, held an oil lease on 40 acres. There might be as many as a dozen leases adjoining or cornering on this 40-acre lease.

Oil is a fugitive substance. It is not in place, like metal deposits. If I should drill a well on my lease adjoining that of the Senator from Nebraska, should drill a well offsetting his lease, he would be compelled to drill an offset well or to forfeit his lease. Each of the dozen adjoining leases, if drilled by the lessee, would compel the Senator from Nebraska to drill an offset well whether he would or not. He would have to drill those wells in order to save his lease, and in order to save his oil, which flows hither and thither in the bowels of the earth.

The Senator might know that it was to his disadvantage to drill a well. He might know that the market was flooded with overproduction and that an additional well would aggravate the general distress; yet he would have no choice but to drill or to forfeit his lease. He would not be the master of his own conduct.

This accounts largely for the deluge of oil in the east Texas field. Small leases prevail largely in that unexampled oil field. Numerous wells were drilled on those small leases, and offset wells had to be drilled under the terms of the adjacent leases. That accounts in part for the deluge of which the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Wisconsin complained.

The oil operators are not responsible for their plight. They have done their best under the circumstances, and I say that their efforts to save themselves stand unprecedented in the business annals of our country.

Mr. President, I agree with the philosophy of Thomas Jefferson, that the individual should not call upon the State for any service which the individual can render better than the State. I agree with the principle that the State should not call upon the General Government for any service which the State can render better than the General Government. Let each discharge the task and perform the duty for which it is best appointed.

Now, attend to the record of the independent oil producers of this country, wrestling with a threatened disaster. The independent oil producers of this country formed an organization, formed committees, and entered into proration agreements among themselves to curb and curtail their daily production from these flush wells and these flush fields. Not only that, Mr. President, but the independent oil producers were not able to protect themselves. They appealed to their States to render such service and such protection as their States could render. The States responded to those appeals. The States passed conservation laws. The States created commissions, authorized to sanction proration agreements, in an effort to protect this industry, and to enable it to survive.

Not only were the civil authorities invoked but, sir, the armed forces of the States were called into the oil fields to enforce those proration agreements and to save the lives of the independent oil producers which were threatened.

The individual oil operator has done his best. He has done all that he could to mitigate the evils which he could not prevent. He can do no more. The oil States have done their best. They can do no more. They have gone to the shores of the sea. They can not cross the sea. King Canute said to the waves, "Thus far." The waves now say to the king, "Thus far."

They have turned their eyes upon the only authority which, under our Constitution, can render them further assistance, and can help them where their own power has failed, after the finest courage, the most extraordinary courage, has been exhibited.

Mr. President, how far did these oil producers go in their effort to protect themselves against this deluge and this disaster? In the Oklahoma City oil fields it costs $100,000 to drill an oil well. The oil wells in that vicinity are a mile deep. Yet the owners of those wells have entered into an agreement, enforced by military authorities, to cut their daily production down to 2 per cent of their potential capacity.

At one time they cut their production down to 1 per cent of capacity. To-day the order is 2 per cent of their capacity, and they have not only agreed to that but they have insisted upon it, not alone as essential to their safety but as essential to their existence.

Mr. President, what does 2 per cent capacity mean? It means they will run seven days in the year. It means that they will run at full capacity 1 week in 52 weeks, that they will run 7 days at full capacity in 365 days. What railroad could run seven days in the year and survive? What bank could run seven days in the year and survive? What other industry could run seven days in the year and survive? No other industry could do it. No industry can do it. The oil industry itself can not survive if they must continue to do that. They can not now make their running expenses. They can not pay the lifting cost of the oil under these regulations.

They do not expect to survive under these limitations. They are waiting for rescue. They are calling for rescue. They are waiting until the lifeboat can come alongside their sinking craft.

There are two great interests in the oil business in this country, the Standard group and the independent group. The independent oil producers are here now pleading with the Congress for this legislation. They believe it is essential to their survival. They believe that it is essential to protect them against the maw of monopoly. They think it indispensable to protect themselves and to prevent the Oil Trust from again asserting dominion over the industry in this country and tyrannizing over the consumers.

Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland said the Oil Trust favored this legislation. Representatives of the Standard group of oil companies appeared before the Finance Committee protesting against this legislation. If the legislation would serve the interests of the Standard group, would they protest it? The independents think this measure will serve their interests and preserve their lives. I do not know.

Let us see what else the independents have done in an effort to preserve their lives. Under proration agreements they have cut domestic production down from the peak of August, 1929, more than 700,000 barrels a day. Under the proration agreements in 1930 they reduced the total production of oil in this country, as against 1929, by 109,000,000 barrels.

They made that sacrifice. They controlled themselves as far as they could and they reduced production 109,000,000 barrels. But what happened? The four great importing companies imported 105,000,000 barrels in that year. Just so far as the independents made their sacrifice and diminished the production in the domestic market, these four great importing concerns took advantage of their sacrifice.

In 1931 the oil producers in this country reduced production below 1929 by 146,000,000 barrels. They reduced the production in 1931 as against 1930 by 48,000,000 barrels, and the importers brought into this country 86,000,000 barrels. The independent oil producers could make their sacrifice, their States could go to their assistance, but neither oil operator nor State could meet these importers at the shore and say "Our home producers are sacrificing themselves on the altar of their industry. You sit in and help them." That was not done.

The oil industry has been bearing either directly or indirectly more than its share of the burdens of state. The gasoline tax imposed by the several States aggregates more than five hundred millions a year. This tax has constructed our highways. If the oil business could be relieved of this burden; if it could be relieved of this one-half billion a year, the price could be reduced and the consumption would be increased—the independents might then be able to survive without raising the "Macedonian cry"—without invoking this relief legislation.

Mr. President, often it happens that a high tariff does afford shelter to a trust or to a monopoly by shielding it against foreign competition. If an agreement can be arrived at here in the domestic market, a monopoly can be formed and the people can be oppressed. But economic conditions sometimes modify the operation and the effect of economic policies and sometimes of economic laws themselves. It happens in this instance that a protective tariff would shield the independents against the surviving members of the trust. It happens that free trade in oil operates in favor of the monopoly and against the independents. Four large companies practically control the Venezuelan oil field and oil output, and they import practically all the oil brought into the United States from foreign fields. With this cheap oil produced in foreign lands they are able to hammer down the price of oil produced in this country by independent oil operators.

It shows what the organized power and resources of a dismembered monopoly can still do to manipulate, to dominate an economic situation. Adjudged an outlaw here in their own country, they have gone abroad and, like Captain Kidd or Lafitte, the Baratarian chief of old, they operate in some other land and prey upon the producers in their own country. When their machinations succeed, then the consumers will render tribute once again to this trust which has been reenthroned.

Mr. President, when this reenthroned trust has crushed the domestic independents, who will undertake to guarantee the American consumer against the oppressive prices of earlier days? These three concerns—I say three now, because the Standard of New Jersey is taking over the Pan American Petroleum from the Standard of Indiana. The Standard of New Jersey is one of the largest concession owners in Venezuela. The Pan American is one of the largest owners, now controlled by the Standard of Indiana, but the Standard of New Jersey is taking over the Pan American from the Standard of Indiana and is consolidating its interests with their own in the Republic of Venezuela.

How does the consumer fare in the land of the monopoly? Gasoline to-day is selling in Venezuela at 22 cents a gallon, and only a short time ago gasoline was selling in Venezuela at 30 cents a gallon, not including the tax of 8 cents a gallon. At what price is gasoline selling in Peru? It is selling at thirty-eight and a fraction cents a gallon, but recently it was more than 40 cents. At what price is gasoline selling in the United States of Colombia? Forty-seven cents a gallon. That is where these four concerns produce their oil. That is where the dissolved trust has been reenthroned again and the disjointed serpent has wrapped its coil around the unprotected consumer. That is what the consumer of this country may expect when the only competitors of the Standard have been destroyed and when the trust has been once again enthroned in this land of the free. The little finger of the trust will be found heavier than the loins of the independents.

Mr. President, I have here a circular sent out by a broker's concern in Chicago. I understand it is confidential. I hope Senators will treat it so. I send it to the desk to be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

[Sales bulletin from Republic Sales Corporation]

THE OIL SITUATION

CHICAGO, ILL., March 13, 1931.

The time to push our Standard Oil Trust is now. Papers refer to the present situation as a "crisis in the oil business." Do not let yourself be disturbed by that. It is just when these cries do occur that Standard Oil gets the benefit of its dominating position.

We want you to bear in mind that the crisis is not for the Standard Oil Co., but rather for the independent producers and also for numerous of the good-sized concerns, the latter being concerns whose activities do not cover every angle of the oil business, such as is the case with the Standard Oil Co.

The so-called crisis is brought about by reason of the fact that for years the independents and those concerns who confine themselves to producing oil have gone hog wild in driving more wells and bringing in more oil than the world could consume. When these independents and other producers heretofore could not get a good market for their oil, they always turned for an outlet to Standard Oil Co., because of its millions of cash reserves and because of its storage facilities. Therefore, when the price got sufficiently low to interest the Standard Oil it would step into the market and buy, and later on as the market improved it would sell.

History is repeating itself, hence what they call the present crisis—that we are now going through—is a house-cleaning period when all small independents will have to stop bringing in more wells until the present stocks are consumed. That this so-called "crisis" will have little or no effect on Standard Oil is shown by the item in this morning's paper, which reads: "First quarter dividends of Standard Oil companies were near record level." A chart accompanying the article shows that the earnings of Standard Oil companies for the first quarter of the fiscal year 1931 equal those for the same period of 1929 and were but 7 per cent less than for the same period of 1930.

This, therefore, is the time to push our Standard Oil Trust and to make valuable friends while so doing.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the point in the circular is that in this period of distress, when the independent oil people are beaten down to their knees, now is the time for the Standard to profit by the calamities of the independents.

Now this is the Law of the Jungle—
As old and as true as the sky;
And the Wolf that shall keep it may prosper,
But the Wolf that shall break it must die.

That is the law of the jungle, and that is the ethics of the monopoly. That is their method of rendering just aid and of typifying the ministering of the Red Cross in the hour of agony. There was once another cross, and it was red with blood. I seek nothing but to mind the wolf back out of the sheep fold.

Mr. President, I have another article from the Wall Street Journal of December 19 last, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Saturday morning, December 19, 1931]

Gulf Oil Corporation of Pennsylvania is using its cash to buy up power companies at bargain prices. This explanation of the omission of the quarterly dividend of 37½ cents December 11 has been given by an official of the company. He said that while the omission was a difficult step to take, it will prove to have been the most desirable policy for stockholders from a long-range viewpoint. * * * It is now shown that Gulf is not merely completing expansion starting in the past year; it is taking advantange of temporary demoralization of the oil industry to acquire distress properties which will be shown to be of considerable value in the future when overproduction will have been eradicated.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Gulf Co. is administering the coup de grâce—that is, the blow to end the victim's agony. Murder committed in the name of mercy! They are taking advantage of the situation to buy distressed properties. The Gulf is one of the four large producers in Venezuela. The Gulf is one of the large importers from Venezuela. Can it be doubted that the Gulf is using its power, and its imports, to aggravate the distress, to speed the end of its intended victims? I repeat that the Standard group, including the Gulf, are opposed to this legislation, while the independent producers regard it as a refuge essential to their lives. I will have one or two paragraphs read from the Oil and Gas Journal to show that these large importers from Venezuela—the Senator from Idaho may be startled, but marvelous to tell—have been in conference this week with the representatives of red Russia, if you please, looking to the formation of an entente, including Russia, that will embrace and girdle the globe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

OIL LEADERS TRY TO INDUCE RUSSIAN DELEGATES TO LIMIT PETROLEUM EXPORTS

NEW YORK, May 9.—With the arrival here of J. B. Aug. Kessler, managing director of the Royal Dutch-Shell; William Fraser, deputy chairman of the Anglo-Persian Oil Co. (Ltd.); and Robert I. Watson, managing director of the Burmah Oil Co., and director of the Anglo-Persian Oil Co. and Shell Transport & Trading Co., a series of conferences on world oil problems, with particular reference to the marketing of soviet oil, will be launched. Leading American oil company executives will participate in these meetings, which will be informal in character.

* * * * * * *

Even in the event of the failure of the rank and file of the industry to cooperate in such a move, designed to harmonize American production with proration in other world oil-producing countries, the major companies in this country would still be in position to make American cooperation largely effective through close control of their own operations.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it seems that this boa constrictor, which, after two generations, after more than half a century of incessant warfare, was unwound from around the American people, is again being revived; is again reforming itself, not only to establish and to assert its mastery over the United States but to assert and establish its mastery and its dominion over the globe itself. We are asked to-day to contribute to that process—to that consummation.

Mr. President, all that the Standard group want the Senate to do is nothing; all the Standard group want any Senator to do is nothing—all that they ask is to be let alone. When Colbert, the great French financier, asked the manufacturer what he could do to promote his industry, the manufacturer answered laissez nous faire—let us alone. All that the Standard Oil monopoly desires now is to be let alone; and when you stand still you serve the Standard Oil group; when you stand still, when you refuse to act, you give aid and comfort to the Standard Oil group.

Sir, it took affirmative action to secure the passage of the Sherman antitrust law; it took affirmative action to prosecute the Standard Oil monopoly in the courts of this country; it took affirmative action on the part of the Supreme Court of the United States to dissolve that omnipotent monopoly.

It will take affirmative action once again to prevent the return of that tyranny and if once reestablished the struggle of half a century must once again be waged in order to emancipate the suffering people of this country. Do nothing and you serve the Standard. If Baal be God serve him.

Senators have urged this argument—that our petroleum exports exceed our imports and that therefore a tariff duty would be ineffectual if not hurtful. Ordinarily I would agree with that reasoning and accept that conclusion but this situation is unique. Our imports consist almost entirely of crude petroleum. Our exports consist almost entirely of the refined products and by-products—gasoline, kerosene, and lubricating oil. The three large concerns which control the bulk of our imports also control the bulk of our exports. They are at once our chief importers and our chief exporters. Their business is organized, perhaps the best-organized industry on the globe. Their business is integrated indeed, the source of their power and dominance here in the domestic market is the fact that they are integrated. They own producing wells; they own pipelines; they own refineries; they own tank cars; they own filling stations; they own tank ships and they pretty much own "the earth and everything that is in it." It is worth mentioning, however, that during the last five or six weeks our daily imports have exceeded our daily exports by about 70,000 barrels a day.

There is one argument which I desire to address to the progressives on the other side of this Chamber. It is the argument in regard to conservation. I believe there are three schools of thought in regard to conservation. With some it is a habit or attitude of mind; with others it is a conviction; and I believe with others conservation is a mere fad; but the question of conservation is involved in this tariff on oil.

Mr. President, there are 250,000 oil wells in this country producing 2 barrels a day or less. You say, "That is a trifle; why worry?" Each individual well is perhaps a trifle, but in this great war against monopoly these little oil wells constitute the infantry; the middling wells constitute the cavalry, and the flush wells constitute the artillery. These 250,000 wells produce a half million barrels a day. They constitute really the ballast of the business. Their output is worth nearly one-half million dollars a day. The capital invested in these wells might well be estimated at $500,000,000. Will Senators say they are not concerned in this production? Will they say they are not concerned in the vast capital invested in these wells? To-day, Mr. President, these wells are not making expenses; they are not paying the lifting costs. They continue in the hope that better days are "just around the corner" and that if they can survive this crucifixion they may rise again from the dead.

That is not all. If the stripper wells, these baby wells, so to speak, are once abandoned, they are abandoned forever and a day. There are hundreds of millions, there are perhaps billions, of barrels of oil in the sands that are served by these diminutive wells, and once abandoned, these wells and all that vast treasure, instead of being conserved, instead of being impressed into the social and economic service of this country, will be lost forever, will be utter waste, will be irretrievable waste. I appeal to progressives in the name of conservation to save the lives of these struggling wells.

Mr. President, I know that Senators on this side of the Chamber shy at the word "protection." I share their principles and I will go farther and say I share their prejudices. I desire, however, to have read at this point an extract from a celebrated report of Thomas Jefferson, one of the most famous reports prepared while he was Secretary of State, on the subject of commerce and its restrictions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Clerk will read as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

[Extracts from The Writings of Thomas Jefferson, Vol. VI, pp. 480, 481, 483]

But should any nation, contrary to our wishes, suppose it may better find its advantage by continuing its system of prohibitions, duties, and regulations, it behooves us to protect our citizens, their commerce and navigation, by counter prohibitions, duties, and regulations also. Free commerce and navigation are not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations; nor are they likely to produce a relaxation of them. * * *

Where a nation imposes high duties on our productions, or prohibits them altogether, it may be proper for us to do the same by theirs; first burdening or excluding those productions which they bring here in competition with our own of the same kind; selecting next such manufactures as we take from them in greatest quantity, and which at the same time we could the soonest furnish to ourselves or obtain from other countries; imposing on them duties lighter at first but heavier and heavier afterwards, as other channels of supply open. * * *

It is true we must expect some inconvenience in practice from the establishment of discriminating duties. But in this, as in so many other cases, we are left to choose between two evils. These inconveniences are nothing when weighed against the loss of wealth and loss of force which will follow our perseverance in the plan of indiscrimination. When once it shall be perceived that we are either in the system or in the habit of giving equal advantages to those who extinguish our commerce and navigation by duties and prohibitions, as to those who treat both with liberality and justice, liberality and justice will be converted by all into duties and prohibitions. It is not to the moderation and justice of others we are to trust for fair and equal access to market with our productions, or for our due share in the transportation of them; but to our own means of independence and the firm will to use them.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, Thomas Jefferson, whose memory I join others on this side in cherishing, said that the way to challenge the respect of other nations was to return blow for blow in wars of commerce and navigation. If other countries level prohibitions against us, we should retaliate with prohibitions; if other countries level high protective-tariff duties against us, we should answer in kind and should impose high protective duties against the importation of their goods, wares, and merchandise.

That, sir, is the rule of conduct prescribed by the founder of the Democratic Party.

Let us bring this situation to the test prescribed by Mr. Jefferson.

The pending tariff item is one-half cent per gallon on imported petroleum. The House imposed a duty of 1 cent per gallon on imported petroleum. Of course, the only source of importation that concerns us is Venezuela. How does Venezuela, with her vast reservoir of oil, welcome oil shipped into her ports by the independent producers of this country? Venezuela to-day has a duty of 1⅓ cents a gallon on American oil imported into Venezuela. Why we have not imposed a countervailing duty I do not know.

How does Venezuela treat gasoline brought into her ports from the United States? To-day Venezuela has a tariff duty of 4½ cents a gallon on gasoline coming in from the independent refineries of the United States, and yet we must keep our gates ajar lest we offend the supersensitive feelings of some of our neighbors to the south!

I was interested in the very powerful address delivered on yesterday by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK]. But, Mr. President, Venezuela to-day has a tariff of $2.66 a hundred pounds on wheat brought into her ports from the fields of South Dakota. Two dollars and sixty-six cents a hundred pounds, a tariff duty of $1.80 a bushel must be paid before South Dakota wheat can enjoy the hospitality of our southern neighbor.

On corn the duty in Venezuela is more moderate—is only $1.17 a hundred pounds—four times the quotation on yesterday; and the duty on wheat is three times the quotation on wheat in Chicago on yesterday. Do their gates stand ajar to accommodate the products brought from the fields of South Dakota?

I turn to my friends from the States where cotton was once king; but its crown has fallen from its brow, and its scepter has departed from its hand. What hospitality does Venezuela extend to cotton, and how would Thomas Jefferson reciprocate that treatment?

It is not consequential; but Venezuela to-day imposes on cotton coming in from Georgia and Mississippi a tariff amounting to $13 a bale. What would Thomas Jefferson do? He would strike back. And what does the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] propose—out of his high sense of chivalry that fears to offend his neighbor?

And yesterday the doors of the Senate swung ajar—raw head and bloody bones came to council, came to judgment. Peru has fulminated a threat against this affrighted Republic. She says that if this Congress is naughty she will retaliate and discipline the Congress of the United States by imposing a duty 300 per cent higher than her existing duties against imports from the United States of America.

Well, of course, I was duly terrified; and after investigating I can appreciate the multiplied calamities that will overwhelm this country if that sulphurous threat be carried into execution. But Peru now—she has such a long start on us—has a tariff on cotton to-day. Senators from the South lend me your ears: Peru has a tariff to-day on cotton imported from the United States amounting to $33 a bale. Cotton to-day is selling for about $27.50 a bale. Peru has a tariff of $33 a bale on southern cotton; and she now threatens to raise it 300 per cent—threatens a supertariff of $99, which would reach a summit of $132 a bale.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GORE. Yes; I do.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator please to give to the Senate the increases made in the duties of Peru and Venezuela since the passage of the Smoot-Hawley Act.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have not the schedule. In fact, I obtained these figures only to-day; and I am unable, therefore, to give the history of their ascent. I join the Senator, however, in commiserating the South and the cotton producers of the South if Peru actually carries this threat into execution and imposes a tariff of $132 a bale on our cotton. Oklahoma produces a million bales of cotton; and I am afraid that a tariff like that would obstruct and interfere with the importation of cotton from Oklahoma into Peru.

So, Mr. President, that threat, with all its violence, should not terrify us beyond self-restraint; and if the spirit of Thomas Jefferson should animate the Senate, Peru might have occasion to learn that other countries have weapons as well as she, and that other countries can strike blows in their own defense as well as she.

Mr. President, I apologize to the Senate for having detained it so long. I merely wish to repeat that it takes action to preserve the independent oil producers. It takes action to protect the American people. It takes action to shield the consumers of this country against the tyranny of the trust. Inaction is the ally of the monopoly. These independent oil producers, in good faith, acting upon the invitation of their country, embarked their capital and their enterprise in this indispensable business. Their success has been their own undoing. Now they are to be punished for their enterprise. Now they are to be penalized for their success. Now, are they to be crucified for their service? Are they to be pilloried between foreign monopoly upon the one hand and domestic monopoly upon the other? Are the independent oil producers now to be forsaken when their calamities have come upon them?

Mr. President, whether I have fought a good fight, others must judge. I hope none will deny that I have kept the faith.

I have a report here, unanimously agreed to by your committee, and I am pleased to report that the agreement is unanimous, signed by Mr. Bullington, of Texas, and myself, among others. You will not find on Capitol Hill a more pronounced protectionist than my good Texas friend, Mr. Bullington. You will not find there a more pronounced antiprotectionist than myself. I do not pretend to believe in a protective tariff, yet I have signed this agreement. This ought to be a good omen. If Bullington and I can agree, there are no two people on earth or on Capitol Hill that ought to be obliged to disagree.

Let me say further that the Democratic State Platform of Oklahoma, upon which I was elected, declared that the Democracy of our State believed in placing agriculture and oil, the two leading industries of Oklahoma, upon a footing of economic equality. The platform declared against tariff discrimination which militated against oil and against agriculture. I think that declaration was justifiable. The platform also declared in favor of a tariff on oil.

Gentlemen, I was not obliged to retain the Democratic nomination and make the race on that platform—but I did. Upon that platform I won, and I feel bound to stand upon it and carry it out in good faith. That I intend to do.

[Extract from Democratic platform adopted at State convention at Tulsa, Okla., September 17, 1930]

We demand an immediate revision of the tariff downward, free from discrimination against the consumer as well as the producer. * * * We favor placing oil and agriculture on a basis of economic equality with other industries in keeping with the time-honored Democratic principle of a tariff based on the cost of production at home and abroad.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution, which I ask to have read by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 216) was read, as follows:

Whereas the officers and directors of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey and the Standard Oil Co. of California are reported to be seeking to consolidate these two companies into one organization, notwithstanding the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and notwithstanding the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States is requested to advise the Senate what, if any action, his department has taken or intends to take with a view to preventing the consolidation of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey and the Standard Oil Co. of California.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I assume that there will be no debate on this resolution; and, out of order, I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, until I have had a chance to talk with the Senator, I shall have to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire objects, and the resolution will go over under the rule.

The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. GEORGE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Davis	Kendrick	Shipstead
Austin	Dickinson	Keyes	Shortridge
Bailey	Dill	King	Smith
Bankhead	Fess	La Follette	Smoot
Barbour	Fletcher	Lewis	Steiwer
Barkley	Frazier	Logan	Stephens

Coolidge	Hull	Robinson, Ark.	White
Copeland	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.
Costigan	Jones	Schall
Couzens	Kean	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, certainly by this time no one can deny that the four industries producing copper, lumber, oil, and coal are in a sad state. Certainly no one in the Senate would be willing to do anything but render assistance to those industries wherever that was possible.

I want to have the attention of Senators who have spoken so eloquently in behalf of these industries and have enumerated the various conditions which exist which make their situation so deplorable. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to enumerate the many other industries in the United States which are in the same condition described as that of the four industries. It would take too long for me to do so, because there are so many of them.

I find no fault with Senators who believe that a remedy is to be found in a higher tariff. If a remedy for the condition of these industries can be found in a higher tariff, then certainly a remedy can be found for the condition of the other industries of the country in a new tariff bill.

My personal opinion is that we can raise the tariffs as high as we please and the descending price level of the raw products will drop and drop and drop faster than we can raise the tariffs. We are in the grip now of an entirely different economic force than that with which we had to contend during the last half century. Assuming that a remedy is to be found through raising tariffs, why confine our action to the four industries producing these raw materials? I have not sought to make the pending bill a tariff bill; but if it is to be a tariff bill, it will be necessary for me to offer many amendments in behalf of other industries, if the assumption that tariffs are going to remedy the situation is found to be the correct assumption.

I need not mention the mining industry producing manganese ore, which is necessary for the manufacture of steel in the United States; or the paper pulp industry; or the great farming industry, the men engaged in which, in my opinion, have always paid about five times more than they ever got out of a tariff.

Here are four raw materials which the farmer must buy, and the Senate Finance Committee comes in with a proposal to put a tariff on those four materials, which would result in raising the prices of the commodities to every farmer in the United States. What is there in this bill to compensate the American farmer for the extra taxes levied through tariffs in the bill?

If this is to be made a tariff bill, and if we are to increase the prices of these products to the ultimate consumer, to the farmer, suppose we do levy, through these protective tariffs, an extra tax upon the farmer of $5 a week. In self-defense we shall have the necessity of offering some amendments to the bill to try to collect at least a few cents for every dollar that is collected through these increased tariffs.

Mr. President, I wish I could believe that the present economic situation could be remedied by tinkering with tariffs. In 1928, when a tax bill was before the Senate, I took occasion to present an amendment, including a comprehensive list of agricultural products asking for tariff protection. The Senate voted that amendment down on the ground that it was improper to inject tariff legislation into a tax bill.

At that time the Washington Post, in an editorial, accused those who defended that tariff amendment with having entered into a conspiracy for the purpose of defeating the tax bill and for the purpose of embarrassing the President. I will read from that editorial, which appeared on April 18, 1928:

> The tax reduction bids fair to meet a political death at the present session of Congress. There are increasing signs that enemies of the administration intend to make certain that any revenue measure passed will be unacceptable to the President. The theory of the antiadministration strategy appears to be that the Republican Party will be weakened if they fail to bring about some popular schedule of taxation.
> The latest proposal, sponsored by Senator SHIPSTEAD, of Minnesota, is evidently designed only as an embarrassment.

So a tariff amendment to a tax bill in 1928 was held by the Washington Post to be a conspiracy aimed at the objective of defeating the tax bill, and was also criticized by various Senators, who, on that occasion, took the floor and said it was an improper piece of legislation to offer to a tax bill. That amendment, as I said, embraced a comprehensive list of agricultural products asking for protection.

The two party conventions met in 1928 and pledged equality for agriculture, pledged that agriculture should be placed on a parity with industry in the economic picture of this country.

Both parties have been accused of not keeping faith. I do not like to accuse anyone of not keeping faith. There was only one of two ways in which agriculture could be placed on a parity with industry. One way was to lift agriculture up to the level enjoyed by industry, and the other was to pull industry down to the level of agriculture. The latter seems to have been the way pursued in order to bring on parity.

I find that Senators who voted at that time against that tariff amendment because they held it to be improper to place tariff legislation in a tax bill are now on the floor in this session of Congress advocating tariffs in a tax bill. I have the vote here, but it is not necessary to read the names.

The question is not whether or not this is a proper item to insert in a tax bill. The thing to be decided here of utmost importance is whether or not we are going to confine this bill to an internal tax bill or make it a tariff bill. If we make it a tariff bill, certainly Senators know that we will be here this summer.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I should like to say at this point that the important fact seems to have been entirely overlooked by some Senators who have spoken here and reminded the Senate that in previous tax bills or tariff bills items of one or the other character have frequently been placed. The important fact is that never before in the history of the Senate have we been faced by such an enormous deficit, nor impelled by every proper consideration to the immediate meeting of that deficit.

I beg the Senator's pardon, but I wanted to make that observation.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am very glad to yield to the Senator.

I quote now from the same editorial of the Washington Post, April 18, 1928, in reference to writing tariff legislation on tax bills:

> A rider to a tax reduction bill providing for increased duties on farm products may attract considerable Democratic and Progressive support, but it will not be approved by President Coolidge. The tariff can not be considered in any such piecemeal fashion. The structure of tariff legislation is too complicated and interdependent for any such procedure to be followed. Many Members of Congress know this, but they are more intent upon making political capital than drafting legislation.

That is not my language. I am not accusing Senators who are speaking in behalf of these industries here of seeking to make political capital. I realize their position. I doubt very much that they want to remain in session here all summer to revise the tariff from top to bottom, and after having done so, in my opinion, coming to the conclusion after the lapse of time that it was love's labor lost.

I am not one of those who believe, much as I regret it, that the depression which now engulfs us can be solved by any piecemeal tinkering with the tariff. I have had no sympathy with those who for the past three years have said prosperity was just around the corner and the depression was simply a state of mind. I have never had any sympathy with the so-called economic experts who have advised us from day to day that the depression would be over in 30 or 60 days. I am not going to take the time of the Senate nor can I find words to express my opinion of men in public life who have had so little conception of what we were confronting. I believe Compte said, "In order to be able to govern successfully one must be able to anticipate" or to foresee successfully. We have not been able to anticipate nor have we been able to foresee successfully.

I am one of those who believe depressions come as a result of definite causes which are the result of policies which have been pursued and therefore could have been avoided. I am not one of those who believe we are going to get out of this depression by continuing the policies that brought it about. I am not one of those who believe that after having pursued the policies we have for the past 15 years, a magician can by some get-rich-quick panacea blow the clouds of depression away and restore prosperity overnight or in 30 or 60 days. I am one of those who believe, and I hope I am not wrong, that it is necessary to change the policies that caused the depression and pursue a different line of policy than we have followed here for the past 15 years. We have pursued policies that have been so inconsistent and so incompatible that they could lead to nothing but disaster. When a nation of 120,000,000 people, governed by a government that pursues such incompatible policies as huge importations of foreign capital with prohibitory tariffs, that nation is bound to get into trouble.

I do not want to be understood to say that pursuing these two incompatible policies alone brought on or caused the depression. However, I believe a great deal of the trouble we now experience is due to these two. Because we are considering tariff amendments here I want to take just a little of the time of the Senate to show what have been the results at least from circumstantial evidence which we have from officials sources, the results of pursuing such policies.

As a result of this exportation of capital we exported something like $25,000,000,000. Foreign countries owe here about $4,500,000,000, leaving a possible investment abroad of something like $20,500,000,000. There is a standing interest charge in our favor coming to us each year of $1,000,000,000 that must be paid in gold or in kind. Of course, the debtor nations have not got the gold. I am not talking about the war debts only. I am talking about entire allied war debts and other loans abroad to municipalities, industrial concerns, of a private character, but payable in interest on this side of the Atlantic in the amount of $1,000,000,000 a year. How can they pay it with international exchange? How can they pay it in gold when they have not got it? How can they buy gold with goods if no one will buy their goods?

When Great Britain decided to become a great international creditor she abolished her corn laws and sacrificed her agricultural communities and her tariffs, because she knew that the two were incompatible and inconsistent, and as such built up a great international trade all over the world. We tried to eat our cake and have it too. Let us see what happened.

From May 28, 1929, up until the present time, American consumption has gradually decreased, unemployment has increased, values have gradually declined. The impossibility of being able to sell and buy goods here, the inability to buy here, and at the same time pay the interest on the debt owed here. The result was inevitably foreseen by the nations of the world as well as industrialists and others in our own country.

When the House of Representatives on May 28, 1929, passed the last tariff act proposing over 800 increased duties on the then high tariff wall, what happened? Up until the 1st of June the international statistical abstract, the Department of Labor statistics of the Government of the United States, and Department of Commerce reports all show that production was increasing all over the world in the first six months of 1929. Labor in the United States increased in employment up until the 1st of June, 1929. These official statistics will show that in every country in Europe and in the United States and in Canada the first six months of 1929 reached the highest point of world prosperity since the World War. Within 30 days after May 28, 1929, according to the Census Bureau, new orders for factory goods dropped 16 per cent; unfilled orders for transportation equipment, including automobiles, declined 23 per cent in 60 days; unfilled orders for steel dropped 640,000 tons in 90 days; cotton consumption by textile mills fell 17 per cent in one month; total factory pay rolls dropped to 106 in July as compared with 111 in May; automobile production dropped 38 per cent from April to October.

On August 9 the Federal reserve banks raised their rates 5 to 6 per cent, evidently sensing that trouble had already started.

On September 4 the Senate Finance Committee reported the tariff bill to the Senate. The following day the stock market started its swift decline, developing into a panic. Share values on the stock exchange shrank $2,000,000,000 in 30 days and $24,000,000,000 more by November 1.

The following June the Senate sent the tariff bill to the White House. To the White House also went petitions from this country's leading economists and industrialists, and also the official protest of 36 foreign countries who the year before had purchased $4,000,000,000 worth of farm and factory products in the United States produced by American farmers and American laborers.

In the year following the House vote 1,100,000 factory workers alone lost their jobs and bank failures had exceeded the volume of deposit liabilities of the combined totals of the panics of 1893, 1908, and 1921, and the total number of unemployed had increased 2,451,000.

The President signed the bill on June 17. By November 1, 600,000 more workers had lost their jobs, and industrial share values had dropped another $18,000,000,000, making a total loss of $44,000,000,000 since September 5, 1929, or the day after the Senate Finance Committee reported the tariff bill to the Senate.

Since that time 23 countries have raised retaliatory tariff walls against our products, and 170 manufacturing plants have been built in foreign countries by American capital, hiring foreign labor and buying foreign raw material in order to make there the finished products which the retaliatory tariffs would not permit us to send them from here.

Last summer I asked a German statesman this question, "You raised your tariff last spring on agricultural products, although you have been importing about $800,000,000 of agricultural products a year. Why did you do that?" He said, "We were shut out by tariff walls from selling to other countries the products we can produce, and so we have nothing with which to pay, and, as we already owe more than we can pay with gold and are not able to sell our goods, we had to keep agricultural products out in order to stimulate agricultural production at home. The United States and other countries started this tariff war all over the world; we can not buy if we can not sell, and if we can not sell to you we can not buy from you, because we can not pay."

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I was interested in the Senator's statement as to the number of factories which had moved abroad. Will the Senator state the number again. I think he said 157.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The number stated by me was 170.

Mr. TYDINGS. I was just wondering if the Senator had any fairly reliable estimate as to the number of men such factories employ or as to the amount of capital invested in them?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No; I can not say as to that. I will say, however, to the Senator that 170 is not the correct number. The data I am using were gathered last October and they have not been brought up to date. It has been very difficult to bring them up to date. I have seen notices in the press from time to time that other plants had been established in foreign countries, thus exporting further capital, and, so to speak, exporting further plants. I have merely been giving an enumeration of facts for consideration now in order to show the consequences of pursuing inconsistent policies.

The Treasury deficit of over $2,000,000,000 reflects the falling revenues and the depressed business conditions of our country.

Why do I say that the tariff vote of May 28, 1929, was an epoch-making event in the history of depressions? I say that because until that date the year 1929 had marked the high peak of world prosperity since the war.

Data published by the Commerce Department and Federal Reserve Board indicate that the high level was reached in May and that the first drop came here in June, the first month following the tariff vote.

The Commerce Yearbook for 1930 states:

> British industrial activity was officially estimated to have been 5.8 per cent greater in 1929 than in 1928, and employment also improved for the first three quarters of the year; the third quarter showed distinct improvement, but the fourth quarter of the year showed a clear-cut falling off.

Employment in Great Britain steadily increased until October, 1929. The decline in Great Britain did not start until four months after it started here.

The same source of information shows that in Germany the production index stood at 112, compared with 100 in 1928. Steel production was 11 per cent larger in 1929 than in 1928. The coal industry had a very prosperous year. The production of coal, lignite, and coke was the greatest since the war. Agricultural production was well above the average of the five preceding years, and railway freight tonnage was the highest since the war. Exports of German products in 1929 established a new high level for all time, amounting to $3,210,000,000, an increase of 11 per cent over 1928. Of the 2,662,000 unemployed workers in Germany in February, 1929, 1,600,000 went back to work in the following six months, as reported by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Manufacturing activity in Canada was about 30 per cent greater during the first four months of the year 1929 than during the same period in 1928. A decline in general industrial activities set in in August, and by December Canadian production had fallen 25 per cent.

This increased activity in all industry in the countries above mentioned was proportionately manifested in Czechoslovakia, Belgium, Denmark, France, Irish Free State, Portugal, Spain, Russia and the Scandinavian countries.

It is to be noted that the business decline was not observed in Canada and European countries until the fourth quarter of the year 1929, while in the United States it made its appearance in the second quarter and within 30 days following the House tariff vote. It, therefore, appears on the official testimony of the Commerce Yearbook and the International Statistical Yearbook that the claim made by some people that the depression originated in Europe has no foundation in economic fact.

I found in Europe a disease that has been very prevalent here. I found that all over Europe statesmen, bankers, and industrialists were blaming all their troubles on the United States. Answerable to their people for their leadership, they had to give an excuse for the conditions prevailing in their respective countries. In this country statesmen, bankers, and industrialists have blamed Europe for our own troubles. Mr. President, it has always been my opinion, and is now a confirmed conviction, that we are not suffering from the troubles of Europe to any greater extent than we have made Europe's troubles our own, to any greater extent than that we have mixed into their affairs and assumed their liabilities. To that extent we are suffering from the troubles of Europe.

From what I know of European conditions, and from what I think I know of conditions in the United States, I think it will come very well within the province of Congress and the province of the White House to confine our activities and our thoughts to solving the problems of the United States. There are plenty of people in Europe working on their problems. While I admire the spirit of those who say we should give moral leadership to the world, if we have an exportable surplus of moral leadership, let us see if we can not find it and make use of it at home.

The records to which I have referred show:

First, that increased production during the first half of 1929 was general abroad and that the only decline in 1929 was in the closing months of the year after the American decline had set in, with the resulting stock panic and depression.

Second, that employment had increased in 1929 throughout the countries representing 90 per cent of foreign industrial production.

Third, that in a majority of countries abroad the highest prosperity was reached in 1929 of all years since the World War.

The decline in industry anticipated the stock-market crash of October, 1929, with its resulting bankruptcies and destruction of purchasing power, which caused and inaugurated a secondary decline in price levels, which has, so to speak, fed upon itself and continued with increased force and intensity until the present day, when 8,000,000 men are out of employment.

The year before the tariff act was passed foreign countries had bought $5,283,000,000 worth of American products. Not being able to continue to sell to or buy from us, there were five things they could do, all of which worked together to undermine our economic and industrial structure and the New York stock market.

First, they could stop ordering American goods.

Second, they could cancel American export orders unfilled.

Third, they could file protests at the White House, which 36 countries did.

Fourth, they could levy retaliatory tariffs against American goods, which 23 countries have done.

Fifth, they could unload their American shares and liquidate their American speculative investments and realize their profits.

The record shows that they did all these things, and did them in abundance. From the date of the tariff vote to July 1, 1931, exports dropped $3,569,000,000. And all over the world the battle of the tariff wall is going on. In self-defense Great Britain has called an economic conference to meet at Ottawa in July to discuss an intercolonial money policy, intercolonial tariffs, intercolonial economics from practically every point of view. The far-reaching consequences of that conference to the United States and the other nations of the world can not be estimated at this time.

Mr. President, I have called these matters to the attention of the Senate, not for the purpose of making an attack upon the protective-tariff policy as such, but to protest against the inequalities always imposed on agriculture by its unfair discriminations imposed by those in control of tariff making and to show the disastrous consequences of a nation of 120,000,000, with such vastly varied sources of production, pursuing the policy of exporting huge amounts of capital, while at the same time raising tariff walls against the goods that are produced by the people of other countries from whom we expect to collect the capital we have invested and interest thereon, and also payment for the goods which we sell.

The evidence of what is to come certainly must have been manifest here during the last three or four days. Will those who are now trying to make a tariff bill out of this tax bill assume the responsibility of having this debate continue for possibly 2, 3, 4, or 5 months? Is this the time in the history of this country, with present conditions as we find them, to have another such session of Congress as we had beginning in 1929 and running up to June, 1930?

I have been one of those who think the balancing of the Budget has been greatly overemphasized by propaganda in the press of the country. I do not believe that the Budget will be balanced. I do not think it can be done. The only way to balance the Budget of the Government of the United States is first to inaugurate and initiate policies that will balance the budgets of the corporations and the citizens of this country. The Government Treasury is becoming empty because the individual citizen's pockets and the treasuries of our corporations and our employers are becoming empty. When the private individual has no income he pays no taxes, and, consequently, the Government has no income. The way to fill the Treasury of the Government of the United States is first to fill the treasuries of the American people so that they have an income with which to pay taxes, and then our Treasury will be automatically filled and our Budget will be balanced.

Raise taxes now, cut down all possible expenditures now, pursue the policies that have brought about this condition, and how long will it be before our Budget is unbalanced again, and the deficit in the Treasury is as large as it is now?

If we do succeed momentarily in balancing the Budget by increasing taxes and cutting expenditures wherever they can be cut, and we find at the end of the next fiscal year that we have another deficit, what are we then going to do? Are we then going to raise taxes again, take men out of employment again, cut expenditures, and continue to pursue the policies that have destroyed the incomes of the American people and therefore the income of the Government of the United States?

That system of balancing the Budget and conducting the Government of a great people is something that feeds upon itself as the depression, the descending price level feeds upon itself. If we pursue that policy to its ultimate conclusion we will keep on taxing the people until we have taxed them out of everything they have and they have nothing in their pockets, and then there will be nothing in the Treasury of the United States either.

I am not so worried about balancing the Budget. I am much more concerned with eliminating and stopping the policies that have brought about the destruction of income to the great mass of the people, the destruction of purchasing power on the part of the great mass of the people. Restore that purchasing power, and the corporations of the country, the industries, the producers of raw material, will be able to employ labor, and we will not have to borrow money and give it to the various communities of the United States in order that they may have something with which to feed their hungry people.

I do not believe that it would be good policy to take the entire summer to talk about tinkering with tariffs. With the present trend of the economic situation in the United States, I have an idea that by November there will be very few people in the United States who will be interested in tariffs.

I do not want to delay the passage of the tax bill. I had not intended to speak as long as I have spoken; but in view of things that it at least seems to me I could foresee, I did not want this to become a tariff bill without protesting. In view of the present situation I think it would be unwise, it would be uneconomical, it would have a bad effect on the country, and I can not see where it will give any substantial relief.

I want to say also in this connection that I regret very much that the Congress did not stay in session last summer, preparing for the conditions we are asked to legislate to meet now. To be called here in December and about every 15 or 20 days to be presented with a measure that we are told must be passed at once in order to stop the depression, I say, with all due respect to those who disagree with me, is not the course of wise statesmanship. It is making an effort and a gesture after the horse is taken out of the barn. We can not legislate for hindsight. We must legislate according to our foresight; and I hope we shall have a little more foresight in the future than we have had in the past.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. HULL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee suggests the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Jones	Schall
Austin	Cutting	Kean	Sheppard
Bailey	Davis	Kendrick	Shipstead
Bankhead	Dickinson	Keyes	Shortridge
Barbour	Dill	King	Smith
Barkley	Fess	La Follette	Smoot
Bingham	Fletcher	Lewis	Steiwer
Blaine	Frazier	Long	Stephens
Borah	George	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Bratton	Glass	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Brookhart	Goldsborough	Metcalf	Townsend
Broussard	Gore	Morrison	Trammell
Bulkley	Hale	Moses	Tydings
Bulow	Harrison	Neely	Vandenberg
Capper	Hastings	Norbeck	Walcott
Caraway	Hatfield	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
Carey	Hawes	Nye	Walsh, Mont.
Cohen	Hayden	Oddie	Watson
Connally	Hebert	Pittman	Wheeler
Coolidge	Howell	Reed	White
Copeland	Hull	Robinson, Ark.
Costigan	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not going to speak on the question. I want to take just a moment of the Senate's time, however, to explain the parliamentary situation as I understand it.

The pending amendment seeks to amend the committee amendment. It has occurred to me, after consulting with quite a number of Senators, who take the same view of this situation and who are opposed to any tariff on oil, that nothing can be gained by two votes. The reason why the amendment was offered was on account of the ruling of the Chair, which, in effect, said that there would be no opportunity to vote directly upon the question of tariff or no tariff upon oil unless the Senate rejected the committee amendment.

With the idea that some of us who were opposed to any tariff law, if we could not get what we wanted, would rather have as low a tariff as possible, I offered the pending amendment. But it is quite apparent, I think, that if those who are opposed to a tariff on oil have a sufficient number of votes to carry the amendment I have offered, they would likewise have a sufficient number of votes to vote down the committee amendment.

If that is done, then, under the ruling of the Chair, it will be in order to strike out the text of the House, and if it is done, I expect to offer such a motion unless somebody else offers it. But in order that we may get a vote directly upon the question, I now withdraw my amendment so as to permit the vote to be taken directly on the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays having been ordered on the Senator's amendment to the amendment of the committee, it will be necessary to get unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska to withdraw his amendment? The Chair hears none, and the amendment to the amendment is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment to strike out, on page 242, beginning in line 23, and to insert on page 243 the first paragraph in italics.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the committee amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate for a moment.

As I consider the pending proposal to be one to impose upon the American people a tribute in the interest of the oil companies of this country approximating probably half a billion dollars, or perhaps a billion dollars, if they manipulate it as the oil companies of this country have often manipulated their business affairs, I am reminded of the appeals which have been coming to me, and doubtless to every Member of the Senate, for the past four or five months, for relief to the American people from what they term extravagant Government expenditures, duplications in bureaus, and the great cry for the balancing of the Budget.

I take it that these expressions coming from the American people are based upon a sentiment which they entertain that the burdens they have to carry at the present time and in the present condition of depression which exists throughout the country are more than they feel able to bear. I can not distinguish between a burden imposed for the purpose of raising revenue for the maintenance of the Government and a burden that is placed upon the American people for the special benefit of a special private interest.

Certainly those who are advocating that we shall impose an import tax of 2½ cents a gallon upon gasoline contemplate and expect that such legislation will be helpful and beneficial to them. If they contemplate that, whether or not they will realize their expectation is problematical. That has been fully illustrated in the past in dealing with tariff problems, and this is nothing but a tariff. You might call it an import tax, or whatever you wish, but it is nothing more or less than a tariff.

If the sponsors of the tax realize that expectation, if they boost the price of gasoline to the 26,000,000 users of automobiles in America even 2½ cents a gallon, and if they advance the price of oil, according to the statistics here, only to that extent, then they will impose upon the American people, in their depressed and poverty-stricken condition of to-day, with industry paralyzed, with eight to ten million people out of employment, an additional burden they will have to contribute of approximately half a billion dollars.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. Does not the Senator think the tariff we already get on lemons and automobiles would help pay that?

Mr. TRAMMELL. It might help pay it; but when those duties were imposed, we were considering a tariff bill, we were surveying the tariff field, and the situation was quite different from having three or four industries only placed in a bill; and those who are supporting the tariffs proposed in this measure will oppose any other industries having a tariff provided.

If there could be an adjustment of the entire situation on the part of all other industries in this country in this measure, then the question of a tariff being injected into this bill would present altogether a different situation. But I am not so blind that I do not know and realize that if those who are seeking to impose this burden of at least half a billion dollars upon the American people, not for the Government's maintenance but for the assistance of one industry in the country, succeed in imposing that burden upon the American people, they will just as cheerfully decline to allow other industries having other tariff items enacted into law at this time.

They will cheerfully defeat any amendment, probably, to reduce certain tariffs which the entire American people, practically, believe are unjust and unreasonable, and it will resolve itself into the question of the Congress of the United States and of the Senate bowing down in submission or in favoritism to one or two industries, and placing a burden upon the American people as a result of such favoritism. It is the height of favoritism, considering the conditions in the country at this time.

I do not care to have the price of gasoline increased 2½ cents a gallon in my State, and if the advocates of this tariff do not do that, they will not do what they contemplate doing, and those who are supporting the provisions of this bill providing for the tariff are giving to them a weapon for the purpose of imposing this enormous burden upon the American people. There is no escape from that conclusion.

I am not willing to have the people of my State, industrially paralyzed as they are, the farmers stricken into poverty practically—and that is less prevalent in Florida than it is in most of the other States of the Union—I am not willing to have them imposed upon to the extent of saying, "We will take about three or four million dollars more a year from you"—I think it amounts to $6,000,000 in my State—"for the purpose of helping these people who are engaged in the oil industry."

That is what it means. Of course, in larger States, the tax and the tribute which the Congress would impose upon the people in their present distressed circumstances, for the benefit of the oil people of the country, would be far in excess of what it would be in my own State.

I hold no brief for any of the oil companies. It might be that the Standard, in its conquest for supremacy and domination, has probably gotten some advantage of the so-called independents. It is regrettable if they have. But are we going to attempt to go into all the business enterprises of this country and settle the conflict which has been waged, and which exists among certain elements in industry, and pass the burden on, if you please, to the backs of the already overtaxed American people merely for the purpose of assisting private industry?

In my own State and throughout the Union we have from time to time witnessed the merchant who has been reasonably successful maintaining his private business, and we have seen the chain-store idea gradually increasing and spreading and spreading, until the chain stores have driven from the mercantile field those who have been engaged in it, perhaps for years, almost completely throughout this country. Why not try to enact some legislation in this bill for the purpose of adjusting that situation?

There used to be a good many independent automobile builders and manufacturers in the automobile industry. Gradually the octopus in the automobile industry has reached out, until it has destroyed practically all or a large majority of the independent dealers of the country. But Congress never legislated for the purpose of assisting either one side or the other in its manipulations, although deplorable.

I think that if there were some way by which we could reach by legislation, or put a double proposition into the tariff item in this bill, to control the prices of gasoline and crude oil and other petroleum products to the consumers of the country, then there would be some justification for going to the rescue of one or the other element in the oil business and the gasoline business. But that is not proposed. The advocates and the champions of this increased burden upon the American people, if it works out as contemplated, are going to allow the Standard—the monopoly—and all the other companies engaged in this industry, if they please, to increase the price of gasoline to the consumers of this country to any amount which they wish.

I think it more important to protect the interests of the consumer of gasoline and of oils than it is to enact legislation which will furnish a weapon for the producers and the sellers of these products to try to take more money from the American people, and that without limitation, as far as the legislation is concerned.

I have seen the manipulation in the gasoline price-fixing business, to the detriment and the heartache of the people throughout this entire country. My own people have often suffered under the price-fixing and monopolistic tendencies which have been exercised by the oil industry of the country. I have witnessed them advance the price one week from 14 to 16 cents a gallon, the next week from 16 to 18 cents a gallon, the next week from 18 to 20 cents a gallon, pyramiding the prices for a period of, say, four weeks, until they had the consumers paying 8 or 10 cents a gallon more in that period of time, and that operation was not restricted to the Standard. Every other oil company enjoying the field, within my State at least, cooperated in the activity, and increased their prices just as rapidly as the Standard did, and on the same day that they increased the prices.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I think there was some error in the Senator's statement, or he attributes the result to wrong causes. The price of gasoline at the refinery to-day is 3½ cents, and casing-head gasoline sells for as low as 1½ cents a gallon. I do not believe that the price of ordinary gasoline at the refinery has ever been much more than 7 cents, and I think the Senator's own State to-day imposes a tax on gasoline of 7 cents a gallon, 200 per cent of the refiner's price.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator proposes to increase that, and to make an additional imposition of 2½ cents a gallon, if his machinery operates.

Mr. GORE. Even that would be only one-third of what the Senator's own State imposes on its own people.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is a different situation entirely. In that instance the revenue derived from the tax imposed is for the maintenance of Government, the construction and maintenance of roads, and for other governmental purposes. In this instance the proposal is to tax for a contribution and tribute to private industry. That is the distinction between the two.

I am very happy the Senator lives in a State where they can buy gasoline so cheaply. Most of the States are not so fortunate. I speak for my own State because I know a good deal about it. There is a monopoly of this product. Gasoline may be purchased at times for 14 cents a gallon and at the same time we have to pay 20 cents a gallon in my State and in most of the States throughout the South.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Gladly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Under conditions such as now prevail any increase in the price of gasoline occasioned by this tax would be absorbed by the few big oil powers, and would not be passed on to the consumer.

Mr. TRAMMELL. From past operations and manipulations and experiences, I very seriously question that. Of course, I know the Senator is sincere in his contention, but I do not accept that as an absolute certainty at all. I do not think the monopoly are going to allow themselves to have to absorb this 2½ cents a gallon on gasoline or the tax imposed on petroleum and petroleum products. They do not seem to be built that way. There is an enormous amount of money that has been made by the Standard and other groups in the oil industry. It has not been restricted alone to the Standard group. They are not likely to do as the Senator from Texas suggests.

I would be very glad to help any of these concerns that have been unfairly treated, that are unfortunate; but I do not propose in doing that to take money from people who are even more unfortunate, people who are more stricken with the depression which prevails throughout the country to-day. That is the only construction I can put on the situation. It is proposed to take from a great number of people and from the entire country an enormous amount of additional contribution and turn it over to private industry; and the very people from whom it is proposed to raise this contribution are in worse condition, at least 80 or 90 per cent of them, than the people to whom the money is to be given.

I do not believe anyone can establish anything other than that. Consider the agricultural interests in the country. The statistics were given by the Senator from Maryland as to the contribution to be made by agriculture. Is there any Senator who will take the position that agriculture is more prosperous than the oil institutions which it is proposed to assist by assessing agriculture? I have not heard anybody saying that.

Another thing that appeals to me in passing upon the question is the fact that agriculture has pleaded, has begged, and has entreated Congress for the past four or five or six months for some assistance and some relief. In the main no contribution has been made to agriculture. If there was as much zeal in behalf of the farmers and tillers of the soil in this country as there is in behalf of the oil companies, many of whom are rich, those who are back of the proposition would have some amendment to the bill promotive of the interests of the farmers of America.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Did I understand the Senator to say that most of the oil companies are rich?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I did not say most of them. I said many of them.

Mr. LONG. There are only four.

Mr. TRAMMELL. There are rich companies who are paying their officers enormous salaries. They have floated stocks upon the people of the country and overcapitalized themselves until they have filched from the American people millions and millions of dollars in watered stocks.

Mr. LONG. I understand there has not been a single oil concern that the Senator has described of that character that is for the tariff. On the contrary, the four major oil companies, the only ones who have been in a position to make money, are the ones who have always been for the tariff. There is no getting away from the facts.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not know who are for it or who are against it among the oil people. I do not know who is going to benefit among the oil concerns of the country. I take it for granted they all hope to benefit under it. But of one thing I am certain, and that is that the contribution which it is hoped to realize is going to be imposed upon the people of America who are already overburdened and who are unable to make this contribution for the purpose of assisting one industry in the country.

I would much prefer to have seen this item taken up in a tariff bill. There has been a good deal of discussion about tariff bills ever since Congress convened, but there has been a lot of dodging around and everybody seemed to think we should not have a tariff bill considered at this session. There are some industries that probably would like to have some additional protection. There are a great many who entertain the idea that certain tariff items should be reduced. I am honestly of the opinion that the sentiment throughout America to-day is that our present tariff law has worked harmfully instead of beneficially to our country and to the industries of the country. If that is true, why not consider the entire tariff question instead of selecting a favored two or three industries in the country?

These matters should be considered entirely upon their merits in a tariff bill. If we start to consider a tariff bill, then all other items that would go to make up a tariff bill might be proposed to be considered, but here nothing of the kind is proposed. It is the desire absolutely to choke off everybody else. The only purpose for which it is desired to use the other industries in the country, for which it is desired to use agriculture in the country, is to make contributions to these favored industries which it is proposed to assist through this bill. It is proposed not only to deny to other industries in the country the privilege of a hearing and the consideration of the merits of their contention either for or against a tariff on certain items or for a reduction or increase in certain items of tariff, but it is proposed to use them as convenient vehicles for the purpose of making this contribution and this tribute to the oil companies of the country. So far as I am concerned I do not think we should have taken up a tariff item in the bill. Then, speaking to the merits, I certainly shall not contribute my vote toward making the stricken people of my State and of the United States contribute $500,000,000 or possibly $1,000,000,000, if the scheme works out for the benefit of special interests.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 242, after line 22, the committee report to strike out:

(4) Crude petroleum, fuel oil derived from petroleum, gas oil derived from petroleum, and gasoline, 1 cent a gallon; but the tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

(4) Crude petroleum, ½ cent per gallon; fuel oil derived from petroleum, gas oil derived from petroleum, and all liquid derivatives of crude petroleum, except lubricating oil and gasoline or other motor fuel, ½ cent per gallon; gasoline or other motor fuel, 2½ cents per gallon; lubricating oil, 4 cents per gallon; paraffin and other petroleum wax products, 1 cent per pound; natural asphalt and asphalt and bitumen derived from petroleum, 10 cents per 100 pounds. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE]. I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mrs. CARAWAY (when her name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN]. I should vote "yea" if I were at liberty to vote, and the senior Senator from Illinois would note "nay" if present.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. In his absence I am compelled to withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is necessarily absent. I find, however, that I can transfer that pair to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], which I do, and vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS (when his name was called). Mr. President, I have a pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. I may be able to secure information a little later as to how he would vote if present. At present I can only announce my pair.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is detained from the Chamber on account of illness. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to change my vote from "nay" to "yea."

Mr. ASHURST. I object until there shall be a recapitulation of the vote and we know how the Senator voted. Let the vote be recapitulated.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not have to wait for a recapitulation; I can change my vote at any time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has a right to change his vote.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. The Senator from Missouri is absent on account of illness. If present, he would vote "yea." The Senator from New York is unavoidably detained, and I understand if present would vote "nay."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] is out of the city, and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] is detained on official business. I also wish to announce that the senior

Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily detained from the Senate on official business. If present, he would vote "nay." I further wish to announce that the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is necessarily detained from the Senate by illness in his family. If present, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays, 37, as follows:

YEAS—43

Ashurst	Dickinson	McGill	Steiwer
Austin	Dill	McNary	Thomas, Idaho
Barkley	Frazier	Metcalf	Thomas, Okla.
Bingham	Gore	Neely	Tydings
Bratton	Hale	Oddie	Vandenberg
Broussard	Hatfield	Pittman	Walcott
Capper	Hayden	Reed	Walsh, Mont.
Carey	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.	Watson
Connally	Jones	Sheppard	Wheeler
Couzens	Kendrick	Shortridge	White
Cutting	Long	Smoot

NAYS—37

Bailey	Costigan	Hull	Robinson, Ark.
Barbour	Fess	Kean	Schall
Blaine	Fletcher	Keyes	Shipstead
Borah	George	King	Smith
Brookhart	Glass	La Follette	Stephens
Bulkley	Goldsborough	Morrison	Trammell
Bulow	Harrison	Moses	Walsh, Mass.

Copeland	Howell	Nye

NOT VOTING—16

Bankhead	Dale	Lewis	Swanson
Black	Davis	Logan	Townsend
Byrnes	Glenn	McKellar	Wagner
Caraway	Hastings	Patterson	Waterman

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I wish to enter now a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment just adopted was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

Mr. TYDINGS. In addition to that, I wish to offer 500 amendments to the tariff law, which I ask may be considered as pending as soon as we pass through the amendments now before us.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments intended to be proposed by the Senator from Maryland will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. NORRIS. I offer a proposed amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment on page 241, commencing in line 20 and extending over to page 242, line 5, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

Mr. REED. I make the point of order that it is too late for the Senator from Ohio to enter the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BULKLEY. This is the second day after the amendment was adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Ohio may be entered to-day. The next amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment is, on page 243, after line 13, to strike out:

(5) That an excise tax shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the hereinafter described articles when imported from any foreign country into the United States upon coal (anthracite or bituminous), coke, or coal or coke briquettes, 10 cents per 100 pounds.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

(5) Coal of all sizes, grades, and classifications, coke manufactured therefrom; and coal or coke briquettes, 10 cents per 100 pounds. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles, and shall not be imposed upon any such article if during the preceding calendar year the exports of the articles described in this paragraph from the United States to the country from which such article is imported have been greater in quantity than the imports into the United States from such country of the articles described in this paragraph.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED and other Senators asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho addressed the Chair before the yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not hear the Senator from Idaho. He has, however, plenty of time in which to speak.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to speak, but I should like to obtain a little information before the vote. What is the amendment upon which we are voting? I did not fully understand it as read by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment again be reported.

The Chief Clerk again stated the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill or some other Senator how much revenue the proposed tariff tax on coal is expected to realize?

Mr. HARRISON. The estimate of the Treasury Department is that it will raise half a million dollars.

Mr. KING. In my opinion, that is too much.

Mr. BORAH. What is the amount of our imports of coal?

Mr. REED. At the present time it is eight hundred and thirty-six thousand and odd tons.

Mr. BORAH. And what are our exports?

Mr. REED. About 13,000,000 tons, 11,000,000 of which go to Canada.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I ask the amount of coal imported from Canada?

Mr. REED. The amount is comparatively small—under 200,000 tons.

Mr. KING. It is 160,000 tons.

Mr. REED. Under this amendment coal imported from Canada would not be taxed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is the Senator sure that he stands upon valid substantial grounds in thus discriminating against a country?

Mr. REED. It is not a discrimination against a country. It is a discrimination in favor of those countries that import more from us than they send to us.

Mr. KING. Is not that a discrimination against those countries with which we have treaties?

Mr. REED. It did not seem so to the committee. Every other country can enjoy the same privilege if it will patronize this country.

Mr. KING. Speaking for myself, it seemed to me, as a member of the committee, to be a discrimination.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, what is the country, or what are the countries, that will pay the tax under this amendment?

Mr. REED. Principally Soviet Russia.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What amount of coal was imported from Soviet Russia last year?

Mr. REED. In the calendar year 1931 I am told there were 216,990 tons imported, but I may supplement that by saying that the rate of imports has very greatly increased since the first of this year.

Mr. BORAH. What is the present rate of imports from Russia?

Mr. REED. I will get those figures for the Senator; I have not them before me.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let me inquire of the Senator what is the character of coal imported into this country?

Mr. REED. The coal that comes from Russia is mostly anthracite coal from the Donetz Basin in southern Russia.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BORAH. I will yield as soon as I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question. How much coal are we importing from Great Britain?

Mr. REED. I have the figures. In 1931 we imported from Great Britain 305,000 tons of Welsh anthracite.

Mr. BORAH. What was the quantity we imported from Russia?

Mr. REED. We imported from Russia 216,000 tons.

Mr. BORAH. Then the heaviest exporter of coal to this country is Great Britain?

Mr. REED. The heaviest exporter of coal to this country was Great Britain, but it is not now.

Mr. BORAH. Which is the heaviest exporter of coal to this country now?

Mr. REED. Soviet Russia.

Mr. BORAH. What is the quantity of coal coming in from that country?

Mr. REED. As I said to the Senator a few moments ago, I have not the figures at hand, but the volume has very much increased since the first of this year.

Mr. BORAH. I venture to say, when the Senator ascertains the figures, he will find that Great Britain is still the heaviest exporter of coal to this country.

Mr. REED. I believe not, but I will obtain the figures for the Senator very shortly.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. REED. I will yield if I have the floor, but I think the Senator from Idaho still has the floor.

Mr. BORAH. I think I am through, having obtained the information I desired.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania tell us how much Canadian coal now comes into the United States?

Mr. REED. About 57,000 tons, I think, comes from the mouth of the St. Lawrence River and goes into the New England States, and a little coal comes from British Columbia into the State of Washington; not very much.

Mr. TYDINGS. How much do we sell to Canada?

Mr. REED. We send to Canada about 11,000,000 tons a year.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does not the Senator think our treatment of Canada is very generous when we send 11,000,000 tons into Canada as against 50,000 tons coming in here?

Mr. REED. They put a tariff on our coal going into Canada. The Senator will understand that reciprocity began in advance under this suggestion.

Mr. TYDINGS. But the Senator is going to be generous enough to let 50,000 tons of coal come from Canada in every year without any tariff in the hope that our 11,000,000 tons can go into Canada without paying the tariff?

Mr. REED. I rather hope so.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does not the Senator think that Canada will probably have something to say about it?

Mr. REED. I do not see why Canada should mind this arrangement, because it does not apply to her in the slightest.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. ODDIE. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he does not believe that under the 5-year plan Russia will soon be able to send into this country an enormously increased tonnage which will be decidedly injurious to the American coal industry?

Mr. REED. Yes, Mr. President; I think that the ability of Russia to export coal will increase fairly constantly. I do not know that I would say an enormous quantity, but certainly enough to disrupt the markets in eastern United States, along the coast.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator to say that Russia is now, according to the last figures, exporting to this country about 216,990 tons of anthracite.

Mr. REED. That is what she sent in last year.

Mr. BORAH. That is less than a single day's production in the United States.

Mr. REED. That, of course, is less than a single day's production of all kinds of coal in the United States; yes.

Mr. BORAH. No; of anthracite.

Mr. REED. I do not think so.

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator will find that it is.

Mr. REED. I have not calculated the figures. I know, however, that the imports of Russian anthracite into northeastern United States constitute about 10 per cent of all the anthracite that is burned in the Massachusetts or Boston area; and the effect of these importations upon the price of all fuels throughout New England is felt far back from the coast, in country into which the Russian coal has not actually come.

If the Senate will bear with me for a very few minutes, I should like to describe the troubles through which we have gone in the effort to stop this Russian anthracite from coming in.

All of the coal that comes from Russia is mined in a basin called the Donetz coal basin in southern Russia. Whether it is mined by forced labor within the meaning of our tariff law of 1930 is a question which we have debated with the Treasury Department for the last couple of years. We have proven by American engineers who have lived there since 1928 that the coal miners who work down there in that basin live in barracks guarded by soldiers; that the miner is theoretically free to leave the barracks, theoretically free to leave that employment, but that if he does leave it he can secure no other employment, and he can not secure the bread cards and food cards that entitle him to his subsistence. Theoretically, I say, he is free to leave. Practically he can not get a passport to migrate from Russia; practically he can not get any other job; and, practically, he can not get anything to eat if he gives up the job by exercising his theoretical right to leave. It is perfectly true that he does not work in chains, and it is probably true that nobody will shoot him if he undertakes to walk away from a mining district; but just as surely as the sun rises he will starve, because he can not get anything to eat, and he can not get any other work.

We have proved that to the Treasury Department, to the apparent satisfaction of the Commissioner of Customs. We have proved it to the satisfaction of everybody except the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. The way the Senator describes it, the Russian coal miner is still in better shape than the coal miner in the United States who has an injunction hanging over him not to quit work.

Mr. REED. I am happy to say that there are not any such injunctions in Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, under the tariff law of 1930, if it can be shown to the satisfaction of the Treasury that an article is produced by convict or forced labor, it is the duty of the Treasury Department to put an absolute embargo upon the importation of that article. I am not going to weary the Senate with a narration of the competitive troubles of our American coal mines in trying to sell coal along the coast where that Russian coal is offered. I can put it all in a nutshell if I say that the Russians have over and over again stated that whatever price we quote they will quote 25 cents a ton less. That is pretty stiff competition for American miners to meet.

It is all right to call attention to the total production of coal of all kinds in the United States of America and to say that this eight hundred and odd thousand tons of imports constitutes less than one-fifth of 1 per cent. That is true; but it is like a toothache. A very small spot can give a very big pain; and that is what this importation of Russian coal is doing to the anthracite coal-mining industry of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to his colleague?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. DAVIS. Is it not a fact that if the coal that is now coming in from Russia and Indo-China were mined in the anthracite region of the United States it would mean work for a thousand men every day in the year for the next year?

Mr. REED. I think it means more than that, Mr. President. I am told by a representative of the anthracite service that if we take into account the importations of oil also, they have displaced 60,000 men, which, at the rate of 270 days per year per man, amounts to 16,200,000 workdays, and means a loss of income to American workingmen of $64,800,000. That includes oil, of course.

Mr. DAVIS. I am not referring to how oil has displaced the coal miner, but to the actual coal that is imported into the country.

Mr. REED. I did not catch the figure. How many men did my colleague say would be displaced?

Mr. DAVIS. A thousand men working every workday during the year. With the long lines of people asking for relief in the hard-coal region it is a question as to whether we are going to have the thousand men working in the United States or in some other country.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator; and yet, as he and I know the conditions in our coal regions, it means more than a thousand men. It means probably 2,000 men working half time, and 8,000 more people dependent upon them who to-day are going hungry.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, Mr. KING, and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, is the pending amendment intended to impose an embargo against the importation of coal?

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then why does the Senator argue that the adoption of the rate carried in the amendment will give employment to the very large number of men he has referred to?

Mr. REED. It will give employment to a very considerable number, because it gives us a chance in that competitive market, which we have not to-day. The cost of bringing that coal over in soviet ships—and that is what they use—plus this duty of $2 per short ton, will just about equalize the railroad cost of taking that coal from Scranton to Boston. That sounds incredible, but one can transport coal from the Black Sea ports to Boston as cheaply as it can be sent from Scranton to Boston under the present level of railroad rates in this country.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. What percentage of the Russian coal is now going into Canada?

Mr. REED. I do not know.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does not the Senator believe that if we put the tariff that he proposes on Russian coal coming into America that coal will immediately displace and perhaps in time take over the entire Canadian market, because by our tariff policy we will encourage the Canadians to buy the cheapest coal?

Mr. REED. There is not any sign of it yet; and certainly the coal can not come to us through Canada.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There could not be a sign of it until the duty was imposed; but it would be a natural result that if we impose this comparatively high tariff on coal from Russia she will take it to our best customer on the north and sell it there to the Canadians, and we will lose our trade both with Canada and with Russia.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I am advised by my colleague [Mr. DAVIS], who knows more about coal in a minute than I do in a longer time, that Canada now has a duty of 75 cents a ton that applies against Soviet coal as well as American coal.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. KING. I was going to ask the Senator how many men we are displacing in Canada by shipping to her anthracite coal amounting to 3,760,000 tons annually.

Mr. REED. I do not think Canada produces anthracite coal.

Mr. KING. Oh, yes; she produces some anthracite coal.

Mr. REED. Not in large quantities, certainly.

Mr. KING. And obviously if, as indicated by the Senator from Maryland, we drive out of our market Soviet Russia, although she ships but little here, she will capture the market in Canada.

Mr. REED. I am not sure that is obvious, with the Canadian duty; but I do not know.

Mr. KING. I was going to ask the Senator one other question, however, if he will pardon me. In view of the question propounded by the Senator's colleague as to the number of men that would be thrown out of employment by reason of this Russian coal——

Mr. REED. Not "would be," but "have been."

Mr. KING. I was wondering how many American citizens, men working in factories and in mills, have been thrown out of employment during the last year or two years by reason of the diminution of our exports to Russia.

A year or two ago Russia was buying from us more than $70,000,000 worth of goods, principally fabricated and semi-fabricated products. Now she is buying but little, because of our tariff and other policies. So we, by reason of losing that Russian market, have driven out of employment a large number of Americans, thousands and perhaps tens of thousands, who worked in factories and mills in order to supply the exports that went to Russia.

Mr. REED. Russia is like most human beings in this world. She buys where it is to her selfish interest to buy, and where she can buy the cheapest. In order to pay for the purchases that have been necessary under her 5-year plan, she has been dumping things like the Donetz coal anywhere she can find buyers, and her conduct has not been influenced in the least by our trade policy toward Russia. She has been desperately anxious to establish dollar credits and pound credits and franc credits and whatnot.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. A moment ago the Senator made the statement that Canada now levies a tariff of 75 cents a ton against American and soviet coal.

Mr. REED. I am so advised.

Mr. TYDINGS. This bill levies a tax of $2 a ton against soviet coal, does it not?

Mr. REED. That is right.

Mr. TYDINGS. In other words, then, there will be a differential in favor of the Russian selling to the Canadian, where we now have an outlet for 11,000,000 tons of our coal, of $1.25 a ton as against the United States.

Mr. REED. The Senator can figure that out to suit himself.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will yield just a moment, I make the prediction here and now that it will not be two years before the American coal industry will find that the Russian exporter of coal has taken the Canadian market from it.

Mr. REED. The answer is that on the coal which goes into Canada from Ohio, and West Virginia, and Maryland, and Pennsylvania, and up across the Great Lakes, the carriage is very much cheaper than the cost of carrying the Russian coal so far inland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Why pass the tariff provision against Russian coal, then? Russian ships can be sailed up the St. Lawrence.

Mr. REED. They can not deliver into the upper Lake ports for anything like the same rate of freight for which they can deliver on the seaboard.

Mr. TYDINGS. But the point I make is that a large industrial part of Canada can be reached from the sea, at least a great deal of it.

Mr. REED. It is a very difficult process, a long and expensive one.

Mr. TYDINGS. It is a shorter journey from Russia to Canadian ports than it is from Russia to American ports.

Mr. REED. It depends on what Canadian port one is talking about.

Mr. TYDINGS. Up the St. Lawrence is closer than the ports of Philadelphia or New York or Baltimore.

Mr. REED. These industrial plants are not up the St. Lawrence; they are on Lake Erie and Lake Huron.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I wanted to say to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] that the Canadian Government is now granting a subvention of 20 cents a ton on coal, and also, as I understand it, the railroads are granting three-eighths of a cent a mile to bring the coal from the Province of Nova Scotia and from the western Provinces to their central market.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have here the order in council which was issued.

Mr. DAVIS. I am familiar with that order in council.

Mr. KING. I was not sure that the Senator was.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] presented it yesterday.

Mr. KING. I had it and handed it to the Senator from Georgia, who presented it. I am glad the Senator from Pennsylvania has become acquainted with it. I challenge his attention to another fact which the Senator from Georgia put into the RECORD yesterday, that the premier of British Columbia has gone to Ottawa and is there proposing to impose a tariff of $5 a ton upon American coal, our bituminous and other coal, which will, of course, be prohibitive. So that we will lose a market for eleven to sixteen million tons of bituminous annually.

Mr. DAVIS rose.

Mr. KING. That is not all, if the Senator will wait a moment. In addition to that they propose to place an inspection upon our citrous and other fruits, and they propose to put a prohibitive tariff upon oil. Canada has been buying from the United States considerably more than $100,000,000 worth of oil and gasoline annually. We are going to lose that market by reason of this foolish and unwise policy we are about to pursue in the Senate of the United States and in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that has nothing to do with the tariff on coal, has it? This tariff does not apply to Canada at all.

Mr. KING. I doubt what the Senator says.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GEORGE. It applies to Canadian lumber, and it applies to other Canadian products.

Mr. REED. We are not talking about lumber now; we are talking about coal.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. DAVIS. I would like to say something to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I have the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor. The senior Senator from Pennsylvania yielded the floor and the Chair recognized the junior Senator from Pennsylvania, who now has the floor. The Chair will request those desiring to interrupt to please address the Chair, so that there will not be two or three Senators talking at the same time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. DAVIS. Let me speak for just a moment for the benefit of the junior Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I am sure it will benefit me.

Mr. DAVIS. In Nova Scotia, I understand, it costs $4.20 in order to get coal to the tipple, because they have to bring it about 2 miles from under the sea, and I would not be a bit surprised if this extra tax were not imposed by the Canadian Government for the purpose of protecting that coal in Nova Scotia, because if they shut down the mines in Nova Scotia there are communities which will be wiped out.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator, if he will yield, that the proposition of levying $5 a ton does not come from the east, but from the western part of Canada, where they ship about 160,000 tons annually to the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. But they could not put a tax on in Canada without affecting all of Canada.

Mr. KING. I understand that. Of course, that is obvious.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wanted to ask the senior Senator from Pennsylvania a question, as to whether under his interpretation of the language of the Senate committee amendment this item would not apply between the United States and Canada?

Mr. REED. It is clear that the Canadian coal would not be subject to the duty.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts obtained the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am going to occupy the floor for but a moment or two.

Mr. GEORGE. I merely want to make this statement, that it makes no difference whether this tariff will apply to Canadian coal or not. The companion tariff to this coal tariff, which applies to Canadian lumber, is already the subject matter of protest, and already the announcement has been made that Canada will apply her tariffs where she pleases, that although we are treating her coal fairly, she does not think we are treating her lumber and other products fairly. I put into the RECORD last night a statement of the Premier of Canada that he proposes a duty of $5 a ton on American coal.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, this issue is a very, very narrow one. We have very properly heard from the mine operators, who have lost some business to the consumers of anthracite coal in New England, particularly in and about the port of Boston.

There are two reasons for it which ought to dispose of this whole question. First, the consumers in New England resorted to the purchase of some anthracite coal from Russia and Wales because they were disgusted with the character of anthracite coal they were getting from Pennsylvania due to its inferior qualities.

The second point, an unanswerable one, is that the Russian coal is superior to the Pennsylvania coal and actually costs from 50 cents to $1 a ton more. That is not my statement. I read the evidence presented in a letter from the Massachusetts Chamber of Commerce, dated April 23. It is as follows:

MASSACHUSETTS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Boston, Mass., April 23, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Member Finance Committee,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In determining its opposition to the proposed tax upon imports of anthracite coal, the Massachusetts Chamber of Commerce has endeavored to base its action upon an intelligent understanding of the probable effect of this tax upon New England.

According to advices from numerous wholesalers of domestic coal, previous lack of competition in the high-grade fuel field resulted in New England being regarded as a dumping ground for so-called second and third class anthracite for several years. Since the advent of imported coal the quality of domestic coal sent to New England has necessarily been far superior to that available prior to that time. Producers of domestic coke have found it necessary to materially improve their facilities and product in order to meet this new type of competition. Some of our larger distributors who handle domestic coal exclusively advise us the quality of household fuel available to New England would immediately deteriorate as soon as a prohibitive tax is placed upon coal imports.

It has been suggested, as an opinion secured through numerous contacts, that the rapidly increasing popularity of imported coal might in the course of time result in a decrease in the exorbitant freight rates now charged for coal transport to New England from the Pennsylvania fields.

It seems to be generally agreed by both consumers and retail distributors that the imported coal is of a quality superior to the domestic article. Those consumers who have become accustomed to it would naturally prefer to continue its use. It is admitted they could revert back to domestic coal with reasonably satisfactory results, provided the quality after the shutting out of imported coal by a prohibitive tariff would be comparable with that now available. However, we do not find anyone who is confident that favorable situation would be maintained.

We believe we have established personal contact with all coal importers in New England. These are unanimous in their opinion that the proposed tax would be virtually an embargo and immediately put a stop to all coal imports. Three large importers state it would immediately put them out of business. Others who also handle domestic coal state it would clean up the importing branch of their business.

This letter is being written with the thought that the reasons for the opposition of the Massachusetts Chamber of Commerce to the proposed tax on coal imports may be of interest. It is offered for the purposes of information only, and does not necessarily require an acknowledgment or reply.

Very truly yours,

C. C. MOWRY, Secretary.

That is signed by the secretary of the Massachusetts Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. President, let us revert to the record of imports, and see from what countries the coal comes. In the year 1931 the imports of anthracite coal amounted, as has already been stated, to 569,599 tons, from the following countries:

	Tons
Belgium	12,790
Germany	22,107
Great Britain	305,495
Russia	216,999

Let me add that anthracite from Great Britain, as well as anthracite from Russia, is imported into Boston.

	Tons
Canada	2,207

The total is 569,599 tons.

Mr. President, I now call attention to another table, showing the imports and exports during the period of the last three years, which shows that there has been no appreciable increase in the imports of anthracite coal.

In 1929 the imports of anthracite were 434,975 tons. In 1930 they were 634,169. In 1931 they amounted to 569,599.

The exports of anthracite coal were:

	Tons
1929	3,041,401
1930	2,278,267
1931	1,587,775

The imports were only one-third of the total exports of anthracite coal.

Mr. President, the purpose of this legislation is to give an absolute monopoly to the anthracite mines which are located in the State of Pennsylvania and occupy an area approximately 3 miles in width and 100 miles in length, where, as a matter of fact, these very mines have a virtual monopoly under existing conditions.

A tariff on anthracite coal has never been written into any tariff bill in the history of this country. Should this bill be enacted the present high prices would be maintained against a necessity of several million consumers of anthracite coal in the eastern section of the United States where anthracite coal is used for heating the homes. This tariff, in the language of the supporters themselves, is not offered for revenue but for embargo and protection. It is clearly an effort by an industry powerful in its ramifications already in control of 99 per cent of the business to completely monopolize and to eliminate competition and under the guise of protection demand votes from those committed to honest protection policies.

According to Department of Commerce figures, the amount of anthracite imported into the United States is less than 1 per cent of the amount of anthracite produced in the United States (bituminous coal is not a factor in this bill because 174,000 gross tons of the total imports of 176,000 gross tons came from Canada in 1931, and we export sixty times as much coal to that country as we import from it—to wit, 1,580,000 gross tons anthracite and 9,350,000 gross tons bituminous, or a total of 10,930,000 gross tons). By excluding the imported coal the potential domestic market will be enlarged only by one-fifth of 1 per cent:

	Gross tons
Total importations, 1931	836,769
Total exports, 1931	13,088,259
Total importations, 1931, anthracite	570,000
Total exports, 1931, anthracite	1,580,000

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am prompted to inquire, if there is no duty on coal from Russia to Canada, and no duty from Canada to the United States, whether it is not possible and practicable for those countries to send their coal to Canada, and then have it come from Canada here, without the payment of any duty?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I assume it is.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In a moment. Something has been said about Chinese coal. One shipload, 5,000 tons of anthracite coal, came here in 1931 from China, and the expense of hauling the coal that distance was so high that that has been abandoned. Yet one of the arguments for a tariff is the threat of importations of coal from China.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I am unable to follow this debate. If the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] will give me his attention, he said a moment ago that the imposition of this tariff would result in putting about 2,000 men in the United States to work digging out the coal which would replace that which now comes from Russia. Then, when he was asked the question, "Will not this coal come in anyhow?" he said, "Yes; it will come in anyhow." So we have both sides of it. First, it will not come in, and these 2,000 men will be put to work, and then it will come in anyhow, and there will be the revenue.

Mr. REED. I am so sure of the Senator's good understanding that I can only conclude he was not listening carefully.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator may be right.

Mr. REED. Undoubtedly this tariff will act as a check upon the imports. Undoubtedly it will not act as a complete embargo.

Mr. TYDINGS. To what extent will it act as a check?

Mr. REED. I am not competent even to guess.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator does not mean he has considered a duty that will check these importations?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. To what extent?

Mr. REED. I should be very happy if it would be one-half.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then if it be one-half, it will only affect one-half of the number of men employed.

Mr. REED. Yes, naturally.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then it will only raise one-half of the revenue that has been expected?

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is on the basis of the total importations?

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator's pardon. The total importations from Great Britain and from Soviet Russia were 400,000 tons last year, and the coal is coming in faster now. The Treasury's figure of $500,000 of revenue was based on an estimated importation of 250,000 tons.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator himself said that he expects this rate will stop over half of it from coming in.

Mr. REED. I hope it will.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then if we got 400,000 tons last year we will only get 200,000 tons this year at most.

Mr. REED. Oh, not a bit of it. We are getting it right now at the rate of half a million tons a year. It has been increasing.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, there is another feature of the coal question which ought to be called to the attention of the Senate and particularly the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. Everyone in this Chamber will agree that commodity prices have dropped, and dropped very sharply. There is one commodity for which prices have not dropped, and that is anthracite coal. The wholesale price of anthracite coal in New York City in 1929 was as follows: Pea coal, $8.75 a ton, and buckwheat, $7.15. In 1930 pea coal was $9.25 a ton and buckwheat $7.15. In 1931 pea coal was $10.50, against $9.25 in 1930 and against $8.75 in 1929, while buckwheat coal was $7.50 in 1931, against $7.15 in 1930 and in 1929.

These figures are astonishing in view of the sharp decline in commodity prices throughout the country. It is because the anthracite coal industry is a monopoly. They have no competition. They have it in Boston because of the superior quality of the Russian coal and because the people of that vicinity have protested against the inferior domestic coal they were receiving for many years. It is only fair to say that there has been a decided improvement even in the domestic coal since competition came into the field. Of course, when competition exists there is an improvement in the quality and there is promise of a decrease in price.

Senators from the mining section have presented their case. I have tried to present the views of the consumer in my section of the country. Suppose both sides are mistaken. Suppose both have exaggerated. Suppose Senators can not decide the precise facts as presented by either side. Is not the right thing to do to let the situation remain as it is and has been always and impose no duty upon coal?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to ask the Senator a question. Did I correctly understand the Senator to say a moment ago that Russian coal is superior to American anthracite?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I read a letter from the Massachusetts Chamber of Commerce, and I was impressed—and I think everyone must have been impressed—with the impartial character of it. There seemed to be no bias or prejudice. They simply stated the fact. They say that the foreign coal is superior. They say from their investigations among those who have been using it, it is superior, and all the advices that come to me from those who are interested make that same assertion. I have no question about it myself. An ex-Congressman who was in Washington recently interested in preventing this duty told me that he himself had used Russian anthracite coal and he could certainly bear testimony as to its superior quality.

Mr. DAVIS. The people of New England would not want to buy foreign coal just because it was better than local coal, I am sure.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not think there is any danger of the people of New England abandoning the anthracite coal of Pennsylvania. I think we still find it useful and easy to obtain, and that deliveries can be made promptly. I think the market for anthracite coal from Pennsylvania will always remain in New England. We found a little competition beneficial. Indeed, over 93 per cent of the anthracite coal consumed in New England—7,000,000 tons—is domestic and only 7 per cent is foreign coal.

Mr. DAVIS. It has been said many times that British woolen goods are far superior to New England's woolen goods.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think some of them are, and if Americans want to pay more for them, they should have them.

Mr. DAVIS. Yet we have given protection to the New England woolen industry.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I remember it, the Senator from Massachusetts stated that Russian coal in Boston commands a higher price than Pennsylvania coal.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; from 50 cents to a dollar a ton.

Mr. NORRIS. If the people are buying it and paying more money for it, that would be pretty good evidence that they believe it is better. Perhaps that is not good logic, but it looks like a logical proposition.

Mr. BORAH. That is good logic in New England.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the anthracite coal in this country is owned and controlled and distributed by a monopoly or a monopolistic combination. The history of the business discloses that. The United States Government has had to make laws for the purpose of trying to control that monopoly. We have changed our transportation system for the purpose in some respects of limiting to some extent the power of that monopoly. We are now asked to put on a tariff for the purpose of aiding that monopoly. I wonder if that is a sound position for us to take?

Here is a great natural resource, indispensable to the welfare of the people of this part of the country, owned and controlled by a great monopoly, with power to fix prices so it can fix the price against this exceptional depression, and yet we are putting on a tariff.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not quite understand that it is a monopoly. There are competing companies in the anthracite region. There must be more than half a dozen companies there competing for the business of supplying anthracite coal.

Mr. BORAH. Do they not all sell at the same price?

Mr. DAVIS. I do not think so. I think there is competition among them.

Mr. BORAH. There is no competition that ever reaches the point where it reduces the price below that which is agreed upon by all.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course, they do not want to reduce the price below the cost of production.

Mr. BORAH. No; I would not expect that, of course. Even if there was competition, I would not expect them to reduce it to that point.

Mr. DAVIS. I know that prices have come down on anthracite coal.

Mr. REED. They have come down within the last month. They do not undersell one another if they can help it.

Mr. DAVIS. There have been two or three reductions in the price of anthracite coal during the last year and a half.

Mr. BORAH. Any reduction that took place, however, took place by reason of agreement among the people who are producing anthracite coal. This fuel, so essential, is now controlled, I venture to say, by a monopolistic combine. There may be half a dozen companies—I do not know anything about that—but they control the price of it and we are asked to put a tariff on in addition to that.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator a question? When this provision was written in by the House it applied to bituminous coal as well as anthracite coal, and there was no provision, such as that which is incorporated now on the recommendation of the Finance Committee, that it shall not apply to a country to which we ship more than is being shipped in of this particular article. Does the Senator recall any provision in any tariff law similar to this?

Mr. BORAH. I have no recollection of any such provision.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think that anyone can cite any provision like that.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I would like to ask the junior Senator from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. BORAH. Wait just a moment! I have the floor. I have no objection to answering questions myself, but I prefer not to have a debate between two other Senators while I have the floor.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BORAH. In addition to the proposition I have already stated, which I think is true, there is now being imported from Russia about 216,000 tons, less than a day's production in the anthracite-coal field. This is the menace against which we are going to impose almost an embargo. We have some coal coming from Great Britain, but all combined it does not amount to a three days' production in the anthracite-coal field. Does anyone think really and sincerely that the condition of labor in the anthracite-coal field is due to any condition or fact other than the absolute control of this matter by a monopoly, and that they fix the price and fix the wage also?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. I do not know anything about the anthracite monopoly of which the Senator speaks.

Mr. BORAH. I do not see how anybody can be ignorant of the fact that we have an anthracite monopoly in view of what has taken place in legislation and of reports on file during the last 20 years.

Mr. WATSON. I am wondering, if there be such a monopoly as the Senator states, why it is not subject to the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law? Why can it not be prosecuted if there be an absolute monopoly that fixes the price of the output and if there be an agreement among all its producers? Why can not it be prosecuted under the law?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. REED. It is because it is much easier to make that kind of charges on the floor of the Senate than it is to prove them.

Mr. BORAH. The enlightenment which comes to me by reason of the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania will be very helpful in this discussion. I know it is easier to make the charge here, but it has been made in such a way that the legal department of the United States Government have taken notice of it. Why they do not prosecute I do not know.

Mr. WATSON. I do not know anything about it. I am just interested to find out whether or not there is a monopoly. If there be and notice has been taken of it, what notice has been taken of it by the department, and if any notice has been taken, why has not it proceeded to ultimate prosecution?

Mr. BORAH. I know it; and I could just as well say why have they not prosecuted a dozen other monopolies which could be named?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. I would not attempt to discuss the legal side of this matter with the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. It is not a legal question. It is a question of fact.

Mr. DAVIS. I do know that if we continue to receive imports of coal from foreign countries it means idle men for us in our coal mines in this country. I do not believe in the bituminous industry we could have a monopoly any more than we could have a monopoly in agriculture.

Mr. BORAH. I am talking about anthracite, and for the present I would rather not get off on the subject of bituminous coal. The suggestions I have made relate only to anthracite.

Mr. President, let me call attention to another point: This amendment exempts or excepts coal coming in from Canada. Canada is now making a trade agreement with Russia. There is no reason under this amendment why anthracite coal from Russia should not go to the Atlantic coast from Canada just the same as it is coming now from Russia. In other words, in order to exempt Canada from the operation of this amendment, it has been made perfectly practicable and perfectly possible for this coal to come in from Russia by the way of Canada.

Let us see what is the situation. There has been some testimony taken before the Treasury Department. I invite attention to the testimony of Mr. Oswald. He and his partner in Boston, as I understand, are the sole importers of Russian coal into the United States. There is just one firm importing coal from Russia, and that is the firm of which I am now speaking.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. BORAH. I will.

Mr. REED. Is it not a fact that the Belknap outfit have a monopoly agreement with the Russian Government by which they are made exclusive agents?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know as to that. Possibly it is so. One can find a monopoly anywhere almost in the coal business.

Mr. BELKNAP. We appreciate this opportunity to be heard, Governor Lowman, and we shall try to proceed as expeditiously as possible. First I shall call upon Mr. Oswald. Mr. Oswald, will you please state your full name, your position, and your address?

Mr. OSWALD. George P. Oswald, vice president of the George E. Warren Corporation, headquarters 2732 Grand Central Terminal Building, New York, N. Y.

Mr. BELKNAP. What business is the corporation engaged in?

Mr. OSWALD. Buying and selling coal.

Mr. BELKNAP. You are merchants?

Mr. OSWALD. Operators, merchants, and agents.

Mr. BELKNAP. How long have you been in business?

Mr. OSWALD. About 30 years.

Mr. BELKNAP. Do you sell American anthracite and bituminous coal?

Mr. OSWALD. American, foreign, and bituminous.

Mr. BELKNAP. American anthracite, American bituminous, and foreign anthracite; is that correct?

Mr. OSWALD. That is right.

Mr. BELKNAP. Does your company import anthracite coal from Soviet Russia?

Mr. OSWALD. We do.

Mr. BELKNAP. When did you start making such importations?

Mr. OSWALD. We started our negotiations in the fall of 1928. We brought the first coal here in the spring of 1929.

Mr. BELKNAP. Approximately how many tons did you ship into this country during the year 1931?

Mr. OSWALD. In 1931 we shipped approximately 230,000 tons.

Mr. BELKNAP. Will you state, if you know, what percentage of the total American anthracite production during the year 1931 that represented?

Mr. OSWALD. Approximately one-half of 1 per cent.

One-half of 1 per cent of the anthracite production of the United States.

Mr. BELKNAP. Will you compare the relative prices at which you sell your Russian anthracite and your American anthracite to dealers?

Mr. OSWALD. Our price to dealers on the foreign anthracite is based on the price of American anthracite.

Mr. BELKNAP. Is it higher or lower than the price at which you sell your American anthracite to dealers?

Mr. OSWALD. Our price to the dealers is approximately the same as for the American anthracite, but on account of the quality the dealers get a higher price.

Mr. BELKNAP. How do you know that?

Mr. OSWALD. We know what our dealers are getting. We have it on file with the Department of Commerce; and we sent at their request around 200 letters from representative dealers all over New England giving the prices at which they were selling Russian anthracite and the prices they were selling American anthracite. The premium for the Russian anthracite varied from, I think it was, a minimum of 25 cents a ton to, I believe, up as high as $1.50 to $2 a ton. The Department of Commerce made photostatic copies of those originals, and they have them on file.

Mr. BELKNAP. Am I correct, then, in summarizing your reply by saying that out of 200 letters from your dealers stating the prices they were getting for the Russian coal none showed a price under American anthracite; and the smallest excess over American anthracite was 25 cents and the largest was $1.50 to $2.

So, Mr. President, the coal coming in from Russia commands a premium of from 25 cents to $1.50 or $2 because of its superior quality. The effect of this amendment will be, of course, to preclude those who desire this coal from having it. Perhaps it will not preclude them entirely, because it is supposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania that some of it will still be imported, but that will be the tendency or will be the effect, generally speaking.

Mr. OSWALD. You are absolutely safe in saying that there was nothing under the price of American anthracite. I am only speaking from memory, fixing the premium.

Mr. BELKNAP. You are fixing the limitation?

Mr. OSWALD. I think that the limitation or range was a minimum of 25 cents premium and a maximum of somewhere around $2, but I would have to look that up.

Assistant Secretary LOWMAN. This is all very interesting, but it has nothing to do with the issue here.

Mr. BELKNAP. I just wanted to lay the foundations and give you a picture of what these people were doing. Mr. Oswald, you yourself have not been in Russia since the fall of 1929, is that correct?

Mr. OSWALD. That is correct.

That, Mr. President, seems to establish conclusively the superior quality of the coal which is coming in, and it seems to establish the fact that such coal is not underselling the American anthracite. It is not beating down the price of the domestic article. If there is cheap labor in Russia, it is not evidenced by the price which is being paid in the United States for that coal.

Mr. REED. I am surprised, Mr. President, to hear a lawyer so able as is the Senator from Idaho charge crimes such as violations of the Sherman law without adducing any proof of the crimes which he charges. If there does exist in the anthracite region such a monopoly as he asserts, it is a crime under the statutes of the United States. For 20 years and longer the Department of Justice, spurred on by Congress, has been bedeviling the anthracite companies and the anthracite-carrying railroads, and by legislation which we have adopted the Government of the United States has compelled a complete separation of the railroads from the mining companies. All manner of proceedings under the antitrust laws have been instituted, and for many years it has been a favorite stump argument and a favorite congressional argument to say that the anthracite regions were governed by a monopoly, but there never is furnished any proof of that assertion.

The best proof that there is no monopoly in that industry is furnished by the results of the operation of their business. I am told that in the boom year of 1929, when everybody, whether a monopoly or not, seemed to be making money, the anthracite companies collectively showed a net profit of 0.79 of 1 per cent on the value of their production. If they had a monopoly, can anyone imagine such restraint as obtaining a profit so infinitesimal as about three-quarters of 1 per cent on the gross of their production? On their invested capital, as determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the earnings of the anthracite companies in that boom year of 1929 were less than one-half of 1 per cent on their invested capital. And since 1929, in 1930 and 1931 and the early months of the present year the anthracite companies earned less than nothing on their invested capital, but on the contrary have shown a deficit each year. What monopoly shows any such record as that? If this industry were a monopoly, which it is not, it would be the most impotent and helpless monopoly the world ever saw, that can not earn one-half of 1 per cent on its investment in a boom year and can not earn anything in the years that have followed 1929.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator if the only competition that the anthracite operators have is not bituminous coal.

Mr. REED. By no means. They have the competition of the bituminous coal from the Virginia fields and the northern fields——

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. REED. They have the competition of the oil from the Texas region and from Venezuela; they have the competition of coke, which comes at them from all directions and which affords a smokeless fuel which is really competitive with anthracite; and they have the competition of hydroelectric power, which, as the Senator knows, is available throughout practically all the eastern portion of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. I have often read and heard people say—I have no personal knowledge of it, of course—that during the war cities, for instance, such as Washington, which prior to that time had prohibited the use of bituminous coal on account of its smoke had abandoned it as a matter of necessity during the war, and that that had been going on more or less all over the country, just as it happened here in Washington, where we did have some personal knowledge of it.

Mr. REED. I think that is true.

Mr. NORRIS. That trend was all to the detriment of anthracite coal, and, having lost the field, I have been often told that that was the reason why the anthracite producers found themselves in a distressful condition. That would apply to them, whether they were a monopoly or whether they were competing among themselves.

Mr. REED. Certainly; the anthracite industry has had to take one blow after another since before the war. In the first place, the anthracite industry is completely unionized. It is the only extensive coal region of the United States about which I know anything that is 100 per cent unionized. That forces a relatively high scale of wages. Then, there have been a good many labor troubles, which have resulted in intermittent supply due to interruptions with the service. Then there has been a surplus of oil in the United States. Then there has been developed a remarkably fine deposit of low-volatile coal in the Pocahontas field, which burns almost as completely without smoke as does the anthracite. There is a combination of all those factors, and in addition, the invention of the oil furnace and the oil burner. So people have turned more and more from this fuel, although it is an ideal fuel. The anthracite industry has had its troubles right along. But as for its being a monopoly, we only have to look at our newspapers to see how the different anthracite producers advertise to compete with one another; we only have to open the circulars that come to our houses to realize the competition between the different varieties of anthracite; we only have to talk to operators in the anthracite region to realize how hard they are trying to get one another's business. I assure the Senator that if he would go to Scranton and through the anthracite region, he would come away with the conviction that while anthracite may be a mighty poor investment, it certainly is not a monopolized industry.

Mr. President, the argument is made that because of this supposititious monopoly in Pennsylvania we should refrain from putting a tariff on soviet coal. If on the face of this globe there ever was a monopoly it is in Soviet Russia.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I understood the argument was made here a few moments ago that there was a better coal produced in Soviet Russia than American coal, and that American purchasers are entitled to the best coal. As a matter of fact, there are some far better fruits produced in Mexico than are produced in Florida. There are better fruits produced below the Rio Grande Valley than can be produced in Florida, but that did not prevent the representatives of the State of Florida from coming here and getting a tariff on all their fruit products.

Mr. REED. If that is the question—and a question is all I yielded for—I will answer the Senator and say, No; it did not.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Just a minute. Let me finish.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wish to say that nobody in America knows that except the Senator from Louisiana. He is the only one who possesses that character of judgment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, turning from Florida back to Russia, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has undertaken to attack the Pennsylvania anthracite industry as a monopoly. Now, let us see what the industry is that he is defending.

There is a monopoly, stained with blood, having no capital investment, because every acre they mine and every tipple they use in mining was stolen from the original owners; and no one dares to enter business against them. Labor is forced to work as slaves—literally slaves—in their mine. The tipples are manned by slaves. Their cars and their ships are loaded by slaves—men who would starve, who can not find any other employment. What wonder that they can sell for less than Pennsylvania can sell and send over the specially picked coal which pretends to have a higher quality because some slaves picked it over to make it look of better quality? What wonder that they can undersell us when their capital charge is zero, when their interest charge is zero, when the poor devil who used to own the mines is rotting in his grave because they killed him as they stole from him? And we are asked to refuse this tariff on the ground that there is an imaginary monopoly in Pennsylvania, and all for the enrichment of a blood-stained monopoly in Soviet Russia!

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is no blood-stained monopoly in Great Britain; and the Senator from Pennsylvania would be the last man to intimate it.

Now, let us see about the blood-stained monopoly in Russia.

The Senator from Pennsylvania, like myself, has never been to Russia. I want to read a paragraph from Charles A. Gill, superintendent of motive power of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. He says:

> Labor turnover continues to be a great problem, as the average Russian desires to travel and see what is going on in the various parts of his country. Increased wages and more attractive living conditions are helping to solve this problem. However, labor turnover in some of the railroad shops with which I was connected was so great that it was necessary to offer premiums and other inducements to keep the men from leaving. We had a total of 200,000 men, divided between the back shops and roundhouses, and a total of over 1,084,000 men in all branches of railroad service, which represents one of the largest organizations in Russia. As I was closely connected with the details of the various departments, as well as with other American engineers who handled different departmental work from time to time, I can freely declare that there was absolutely no evidence of forced labor.

What reason is there to doubt this man's statement? He is in the employ of one of the great corporations of the United States. He is a man responsible as to position and as to character. He has been there. He was in a position to know.

> From my general observations of labor conditions in the Soviet Union I can state that while in some respects these conditions differ from those in the United States, the Russian worker is free at all times to quit his job and apply elsewhere for work.

There might be a great deal more evidence of that kind produced, but I think it is unnecessary.

The Senator from Pennsylvania seems to think that I was outside of the proprieties of the situation in saying that there was a monopoly, and thereby charging a crime. Monopoly is in a sense a crime, although in modern society it is no longer regarded as an odious one. It is rather a popular one. Nobody takes umbrage at being called a monopolist. It is rather a badge of honor and distinction in some respects. I certainly did not mean to charge a crime in the sense in which we ordinarily use that term; but I repeat that, in my judgment, the evidence is at hand to disclose that the anthracite coal field of this country is in the control of a monopoly which fixes prices. It is in control of a combination which fixes the prices at which its members sell coal, and it is a combination which agrees upon the wage which is to be paid. Whether it technically comes within what the Department of Justice would regard as necessary in order to prove it, I do not know; but for the purpose of legislation, in arriving at what is just and equitable in this situation, it is a monopoly.

As to bloodstained workmen, there have been some in Pennsylvania. We had an investigation here a year and a half ago which disclosed conditions just as bad as have ever been disclosed in Soviet Russia.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, I merely wish to call attention to some additional phases of the significance of our action in voting this tariff on coal.

I do not think we should undertake to fool ourselves in any sense as we proceed to vote this $2 a ton tariff on coal. If it were possible to offer a proposal based more or less on false pretense, I think this one contains more of the elements of false pretense than most others of this nature.

In the first place, it is written down here in the bill, in a semiserious manner, as an excise tax. That is a misnomer, and, of course, a transparent disguise.

In the second place, it is represented that protection against imports from other countries is thoroughly justified by this coal-tariff proposal.

Mr. President, I think 50 per cent of the Smoot-Hawley bill was based on fear. The other 50 per cent was based more or less on selfishness.

In this particular instance, it is virtually conceded by the able Senator from Pennsylvania that the entire coal-tariff proposal is based upon fear—and remote or speculative fear as well.

There is not a scintilla of basic fact on which to predicate a tariff on coal. No more sleeveless case could be presented so far as bituminous or soft coal is concerned. It can not offer a remote claim for tariff protection. And yet, Mr. President, this committee and this legislative body are proposing seriously to violate the doctrine of equality as contained in our present international policy of unconditional favored-nation treatment.

In one breath we announce to the world by this provision that we will give every nation alike a $2 per ton rate on coal. In the next breath we announce that we will make an exception in the case of Canada and discriminate in Canada's favor and against all the other nations of the world, in outright violation of our solemn moral obligations under the unconditional favored-nation doctrine which we profess to stand for unequivocally.

That is the first rank discrimination that creeps out in this proposal.

In the next place, Mr. President, we are undertaking to challenge or invite other nations by a purely sleeveless tariff enactment here, as we have been doing for some years, to construct retaliatory tariffs or similar obstructions against us. Canada has been our best customer. We have been selling Canada more goods in the past, each year, than we have sold any other nation in the world. Since our new and unnecessary system of tariffs has been prescribed against Canada in recent years we have seen our exports to that country fall first from $950,000,000 in 1929 to $670,000,000 in 1930, and to three hundred and odd millions in 1931. Our export trade is drying up as rapidly as is humanly possible; and it arises largely from the fact that this Nation has led the world during the past three or four years into the most general and bitter economic war that has ever raged in time of peace.

We have not only invited but, as stated, we have challenged other countries everywhere to retaliate against almost every sort of a trade obstruction that our imagination could conceive and install.

Mr. President, I desire to make further record of the fact that in enacting this additional tariff item we are still farther departing from every policy that would contemplate the development of any important foreign-trade interests on the part of this Nation. We are turning our backs literally away from every commercial policy except one of production and consumption here at home.

I was surprised to see the distinguished junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] rise and call attention to the fact that the little driblet of coal imports coming in here displaced a thousand coal miners in Pennsylvania. Why, Mr. President, at that very time we were shipping and selling abroad fifteen times the amount of coal that was being imported, and giving to American miners in fifteen times the number the Senator from Pennsylvania refers to employment at good wages. From the demonstration here, we would imagine that this country is about to be overwhelmed by sluices and floods of imports of oil and coal and lumber and a long list of other products.

Mr. President, I know how agreeable this tariff proposal is to the distinguished senior Senator from Utah. He is often fair, even in making tariff estimates, if he did bring out some surprising figures of estimates on yesterday.

The point I wish to emphasize here—and I shall then pause for any Senator to rise and contradict me—is that we are engaging to-day and this week in the enactment of purely embargo tariffs, not moderate tariffs, not high tariffs, not merely tariffs which might even by accident permit a sporadic import now and then, here and there, but we are deliberately and premeditatedly enacting embargo tariffs against four great international commodities.

The Finance Committee, steeped in high tariffs as it is, was unwilling to stultify itself by even pretending that any revenues would be derived from these items. Much as the Treasury is in need of revenue, urgent as is the necessity to rake and scrape together Treasury estimates as large as possible from every conceivable source, the Treasury has too much decency to become a party to offering estimates of revenues which now could not possibly arise under a set of embargo enactments.

After all this discussion, and this attempt at defense by the Senators from Pennsylvania, we find that the Treasury has estimated a return of only the purely nominal sum of $500,000 of revenue from the enactment of this coal tariff, and the Finance Committee likewise had the decency to O. K. that estimate and to solemnly bring it into the Senate with the stamp of its approval.

I challenge any Senator on this floor to rise in his place and deny that this is not purely an embargo tariff, and a tariff that was never less needed at any time in the history of this Nation, a tariff that will cost us $10 in exports for every 10 cents that we shut out in imports. I pause for any Senator, whether he calls himself a Republican or a Democrat, whether he has any kind of stable economic philosophy or has none, to rise in his place and say that this is not a purely open, unadulterated, bald, embargo tariff.

If we have come to that, I am not censuring anybody for supporting it, although I dissent most emphatically. I merely want to make a record of what is going on here in the Capital of the Nation, in order that the tens of millions of unemployed laborers may know just why they are unemployed.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HULL. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Is any better proof needed than to review what took place here a half hour ago? First the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] plead that we put the unemployed people in Pennsylvania back to work, and he asserted that if this tariff were passed, it would stop the importation of the coal that was coming in, and that 2,000 men would be put to work to mining in America. Then, upon cross-examination, he said only 1,000 would be so employed. Then, right after that, he said, "The idea of this coal coming in from this bloodstained monopoly across the sea," which disclosed his real purpose, showing he did not want any of it to come in at all.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HULL. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Maryland is talking about the importation of coal. I wonder whether he is interested more in the miners who mine the coal in some other country than he is interested in the miners who are employed here?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee permit me to answer that question?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. I want to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I am just as certain of what I am about to say as I am that I am standing here facing him, that what this tariff is going to do is to drive the coal which has been coming to this country into Canada, and the Russians sooner or later will realize the possibilities of the Canadian market, and the 11,000,000 tons of coal which American miners are now mining and shipping to Canada, are going to be displaced by coal shipped in by the Russians.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HULL. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I say to my friend from Pennsylvania that I believe that this whole tariff measure before us, plus the lumber tariff, will lose the American market in Canada for 16,000,000 tons of American coal annually, will close down scores of American bituminous mines, and throw out of employment tens of thousands of American miners? While the Senator is pleading for a thousand men working in a monopolistic business in two counties in Pennsylvania, where the anthracite coal is controlled by monopolistic organizations, he is advocating a measure which would drive out of employment thousands of American miners who are now engaged in producing bituminous coal which we ship across the line to Canada.

I repeat what I said a few moments ago. I handed to the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] a report which came from Montreal, showing that the premier of British Columbia had gone to Ottawa, and, in part retaliation for tariff legislation in this country, Canada proposes to impose a tariff of $5 a ton upon American coal. That, of course, will foreclose us from selling to Canada and shipping to Canada the twelve to sixteen million tons annually which have been going to Canada.

It is proposed also practically to embargo American fruits, and we find in Canada a market for millions of dollars' worth of American citrus and other fruits.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HULL. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not agree with the Senator from Utah that there is a monopoly in Pennsylvania in anthracite coal; but I do want to point out to him what the Senator from Idaho a few moments ago said, that Belknap & Co. are the agents of Russia here in selling coal, and if they have the exclusive agency of it, I am going to have some fear that there is going to develop a great monopoly in Russian coal, and what will that do to coal in this country? It will do just the same as it has done in every other line that has come in where the Russians have been given a monopoly.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee permit me to answer that?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the Senator from Tennessee really has the right to yield for only a question; and, if the Senator continues to yield for speeches, the Chair will hold that he has yielded the floor.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. HULL. If I do not lose the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will not lose the floor if he yields for a question.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Tennessee to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania this question: If it is so wrong for us to buy coal from the Russians, a mere pittance of three or four hundred thousand dollars' worth, it seems to me to be a greater crime to sell them $70,000,000 worth of stuff with which they can become prosperous and spread their propaganda all over the world.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, if it is permissible, I will proceed now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, I have some language before me of very distinguished Republican origin relating to the situation which confronts us.

I would like to say, in the first place, that if Alexander Hamilton, or Thad Stevens, or Garfield, or Blaine, or McKinley, or Dingley, or even Payne, were back here and could see one connected string of embargo tariffs making their way steadily through this Capitol, they would be utterly astonished and wonder at their own moderation.

This is the culmination apparently—and I am not personally complaining, except that I desire to record the full significance of what is going on—this is the culmination apparently of a policy of tariffs upon tariffs, and then still tariffs upon tariffs, until it is literally run to seed.

Mr. President, when we talk about imports displacing American labor, in my opinion, we are unwittingly creating an entirely false impression as to the full picture that is presented. In the first place, I recall that in 1929 this Nation shipped and sold automobiles, machinery, textiles, cotton, wheat, and other surplus commodities to sixty-odd nations of the world to the amount of $3,798,000,000, thereby giving employment in this country to some two and a half to three million families.

My distinguished friend the Senator from Pennsylvania, speaking about the thousand wage earners who were displaced by the importation of a little driblet of coal from somewhere, seem oblivious of the fact that these unnecessary tariffs which are being piled up here so recklessly and indiscriminately, have already caused the flight of many billions of capital from America, including a billion and a half to Canada, to employ Canadian labor instead of American labor, to manufacture aluminum, and automobiles, and 75 other staple commodities, and ship and sell them to all the nations of the world.

There is an illustration, the constant flight, on an increasing scale, of American capital to all the nations, in order that it may earn something by manufacturing and selling behind the tariff walls of other countries, which have been run up in retaliation primarily against this country.

We are proceeding openly and deliberately, Mr. President, along the lines of that policy. We, as the greatest creditor and surplus-producing nation, are deliberately turning our backs upon every consideration of foreign markets for our surpluses.

We are doing this in the face of the fact that this Nation to-day is literally glutted with surpluses in scores of important lines, with the further result that labor, of course, is out of employment for the patent reason that there is nowhere to sell our products. We propose, blindly and merrily, to proceed along that impossible course which can not possibly have any but a disastrous end.

Now I come to the next item. I am attempting to give a résumé briefly of what we are actually doing as I honestly view it. Here is lumber. Again the Treasury had too much respect for itself and the Finance Committee, headed by the able Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], had too much respect for itself to bring in a false report about the possible revenue that would be derived at the customshouse from imports of lumber under this $3 per thousand item that is contained in the bill. The manifest reason was that this is an embargo provision, another bald, stark, unadulterated embargo provision. I pause again for any Senator of any political persuasion to rise and challenge that statement, because I will prove it on him by the Treasury and by the solemn action of the Finance Committee as well as the physical facts.

Yet we have herded ourselves together here for the amazing spectacle in the twentieth century civilization to go back virtually to the old mercantile policy of the sixteenth century and undertake to live here unto ourselves upon the absurd theory that we can consume what we produce. There is nothing more fantastic. I shall stand here, Mr. President, though I may be the only Senator to do it, and call attention to what I think are the sound and true economics of our situation, to what I think is the proper place that America occupies in the world economic situation. Of course, I shall continue in vain to plead with my associates in support of the policy of the domestic market plus an ever-increasing foreign market for our ever-increasing surplus production in this country.

Mr. President, I want to close by quoting the statement of the very able gentleman who is now at the head of the national administration in his speech in Boston in 1928. I quote President Hoover. He said:

> To insure continuous employment and maintain our wages we must find a profitable market for our surpluses.

Then he said:

> Our total volume of exports translates itself into employment for 2,400,000 families, while its increase in the last seven years has interpreted itself into livelihood for 500,000 additional families in the United States.

Mr. President, that is 50 per cent of the number of wage earners that are employed in the whole manufacturing industry of America to-day. The 8,000,000 to 9,000,000 that are usually employed, under the devastating influences of this panic and under the impossible condition of marketing the surplus they produce have been laid off to the extent that there are scarcely more than 5,000,000 in employment, which is but double the number that the foreign market some years ago would have furnished full-time employment for here at home at full wages.

Mr. President, I assume that the deficit in the Treasury has been filled. While we have been oblivious of the condition of the Treasury, I am going to assume that the deficit has already been composed and taken care of.

I am not going to insult the intelligence of this body even by pretending anything else, because I know that this great membership would not turn away from a great national emergency upon which hinges the very credit of the Nation itself, and go off into a long indefinite period of logrolling and trafficking and trading with respect to purely selfish matters that are wholly foreign to any serious proposal to raise revenue or even to remotely think about the condition of the Treasury. If we are to depart entirely from that, of course, I shall not undertake to support any bill that is labeled a Treasury tax-relief measure. I am sure that the gentlemen who are foisting these tariff things into this measure would not expect many of us any longer to take them seriously enough as the sponsors of a tax bill to relieve the Treasury, to give our support to such a bill on its passage, or to give further serious thought to such a bill.

Now that we have turned entirely to tariff matters based largely on the purely speculative remote possibility that at some time during the next generation a few lumps of coal might filter in here from Russia, now that we have gone out upon such a wild chase as that, I think I shall offer an amendment which will propose a 15 or 20 per cent reduction in the present rates on all imports above a rate of 40 per cent. This will deal with that higher and more prohibitive range of embargo rates in the Smoot-Hawley bill that would not call for the assistance of a Tariff Commission; and in the event that some time in the future the membership of this body should give it a majority approval, it would serve notice upon other countries that America has finally reached the limit of her wild tariff debauch, that she is now ready to halt and instead of leading the world through further bitter economic war she will join in leading it back in the opposite direction.

President Hoover complacently vetoed the measure that contemplated such confidence and such concerted action among the nations of the world as would have resulted in halting these wild movements of trade obstructions upward and all the nations somewhat in concert moving through their respective parliamentary governments at home in their own way back in the direction of moderation. Failing to secure presidential approval of that, the alternative in my judgment is to seek some kind of expression from the people's representatives in Congress to the effect that we are in a state of mind to halt these mad movements ever upward and face in the opposite direction.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of business to-day the Senate recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I had understood there was to be a proposal to adjourn early to-morrow, but I shall not object to the Senator's request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG. The Senator should have asked to recess at the end of to-day's business.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I asked, and the order has been entered accordingly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I think we have been diverted somewhat from the issue. The question is not, so far as the Congress is concerned, between the anthracite operators of Pennsylvania and the anthracite operators of Russia. It is not even between the coal miners of Pennsylvania and the coal miners of Russia, except remotely. It is a question between the consumers of America and the anthracite monopoly of Pennsylvania. It is a question whether we are going to vote to give this monopoly an embargo and increase the tax on coal $2.24 a ton.

We have heard a good deal about and we all sympathize with the unemployed. It is time for the Senate to give consideration also to the consumers. I want to read a letter from a clergyman living in the hills of New Hampshire who voluntarily wrote me this letter after the House had taken action upon this matter. I think he speaks the sentiments of the consumers of this country on this issue. He wrote as follows:

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am writing this hurried note relative to the exorbitant tax the House placed on coal, a tax of $2 a ton. It means for me $100 more for my winter's supply of coal. This is indeed a very poor way of helping the poor in this time of distress. The Senators who will vote to eliminate this from the tax bill will deserve the highest praise of the people. If it becomes law, it will cause untold suffering among the poor next winter. It is crime. I hope the Senate will be merciful enough to vote this down. With low wages and unemployment and such high taxes, what is to become of the poor? If the lawmakers could but hear the public, they would be slow in voting such burdens. I hope, my dear Senator, you will align yourself with the poor.

Mr. President, I think that letter puts the issue very clearly and very directly.

Here is a monopoly with 99 per cent of the domestic production in its control. It is proposed to levy a tariff here that is equivalent to an embargo in order to give it complete control of the domestic market and permit it to raise prices to the extent of $2.24 per ton indiscriminately. I inquired, Will this monopoly raise the prices? Something was said in the early part of the debate about that, and I sent to the Senate Office Building for my files, because I knew a telegram had reached me recently on that subject. Will the prices go up? I have read the record of anthracite-coal prices in New York during the years 1929, 1930, and 1931, showing that anthracite coal was one of the few commodities as to which there had been a steady increase in price. If you want proof whether anthracite operators constitute a monopoly or not and intend to raise prices if they can hold their monopoly, let me read a telegram of—

May 6—

Of this year—

despite public announcement Anthracite Institute—

Despite the public announcement of the Anthracite Institute—that producers would not take advantage of proposed import tax to increase price, wholesale prices, standard sizes anthracite, increased May 1, 15 cents per ton.

MASSACHUSETTS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.
C. C. MOWRY, Secretary.

I want no mistake about what this vote means. Whatever may be said about any other item, certainly coal with this outrageous tariff duty is indefensible. This action of ours in imposing this duty means that the few bushels of coal that have been helpful in keeping down the prices of coal along the Atlantic seaboard will be denied access to our shores. It means that we shall give this monopoly, controlling this valuable natural resource, absolute control of the American market, and subject the people of the northeastern and northern part of the country to the burden of an increased tax upon anthracite coal, the deposits of which are so close at hand.

I will not review the other arguments with reference to this subject, nor will I dwell upon the fact that the Russian coal, which has been referred to, is superior in quality and is bringing a higher price. It seems to me that there is not anything in support of this proposition except that it fits into the combination here to make a majority vote for all these tariff duties by exchange of votes.

As the clergyman said in his letter to me, it is a crime to deal with the public in this manner, especially with the people in the cold regions of this country who must buy anthracite. The well-to-do are now using oil, but the poor still have to buy anthracite.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I am very much impressed by what the Senator from Massachusetts has said about monopolies, but I was going to say that it would seem that the regulation of monopolies could be brought about better through the law than by leaving our workmen unprotected. Like the Senator from Massachusetts, I do not think we ought to permit monopolies; but, assuming there is a monopoly, nevertheless, we want the American worker protected in this country. The way to get rid of a monopoly is through trust laws; and if we have not got strong enough laws for that purpose, we ought to amend them.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Of course, the way to deal with a monopoly is through the legislation restricting their excesses and their abuses; but, as the Senator from Louisiana knows, we have not had very much success in doing that. However, we are dealing with consumers here. Again and again in the discussion of these tariff duties we hear the side of the operators or of the importers or the American producers presented, but rarely, if ever, is there a voice raised here to call attention to the fact that this is a tax and that the tax is paid by the public. The question of whether or not it is burdensome to the consumer is rarely ever discussed, and the question of whether or not it is just to him is rarely ever discussed.

Mr. President, let the roll be called and let it be known what this rate means—monopoly on one side and the consumer protesting the paying of $2 a ton more for their coal on the other side.

Mr. President, I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD some correspondence I have had on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Extract from the minority Finance Committee report in opposition to duty on coal]

COAL

The proposed duty on coal and coke as carried in the present bill, in our judgment, is utterly preposterous. According to Department of Commerce figures we exported 13,088,259 tons of coal and coke in 1931 and imported only 836,769 tons, a ratio of 16 to 1 in favor of our exports. The total production of coal and coke in the United States in 1931 was 459,716,104 tons, so that our imports of 836,769 tons represent less than one-fifth of 1 per cent of our total coal and coke production. It is to eliminate this almost infinitesimal amount of imported coal, which does not undersell domestic coal but in fact commands a higher price than the domestic product, that this tariff duty of 10 cents per 100 pounds, $2 per short ton, is in the bill. It will raise no revenue whatever. By the exclusion of the imported coal it will enlarge the potential domestic market by one-fifth of 1 per cent. The proponents of this tariff have but one objective. They hope to displace 600,000 tons of imported anthracite coal now sold in New England with an equal amount of Pennsylvania anthracite.

BRIEF AGAINST COAL TARIFF TAX IN REVENUE BILL

(Submitted by George E. Warren Corporation, New York and Boston)

No tariff duty on imported coal was contained in the revenue bill as reported by the House Ways and Means Committee. The House itself accepted an amendment (without a record vote so far as coal tariff alone was concerned) levying an excise tax on "coal (anthracite or bituminous), coke, or coal or coke briquettes" at the rate of 10 cents per 100 pounds, or $2 a short ton. This amendment was sponsored by representatives of the anthracite-coal monopoly in Pennsylvania and was put into the House bill without previous consideration, and with only the briefest discussion, and at a time when only half the House membership was in the Chamber. Once in the bill the parliamentary situation in the House precluded separate roll call on the coal paragraph.

The Senate Finance Committee retained the coal tariff tax in the bill as reported to the Senate; Title IV, section 601 (c) (5); but with an important qualifying sentence as follows: "The tax * * * shall not be imposed * * * if during the preceding calendar year the exports * * * from the United States to the country from which such article is imported have been greater in quantity than the imports into the United States from such country of such articles, etc. * * *."

The explanation of this exemption is the fact that approximately 11,000,000 tons of American coal—anthracite and bituminous—find a market in Canada, while less than 200,000 tons of Canadian coal comes into the United States. By exempting Canadian coal from the operation of this tariff the proponents of the tariff are cherishing the delusion that our own coal industry will escape retaliatory tariff tactics by Canada and save the annihilation of our present export coal trade to Canada. In our judgment, the bituminous-coal operators who now have a share of the Canadian coal market are destined to have a sad awakening if this coal tariff becomes law.

1. Our coal imports are negligible.
2. A coal tariff will yield no revenue.
3. No report by Tariff Commission on coal.
4. A coal tariff will bring foreign retaliation.
5. Our export-coal business menaced.
6. Unemployment relief not an issue in coal tariff.
7. The Chinese-Russian bogey.
8. The American consumer.

Why this coal tariff tax should be rejected

I. IMPORTS OF COAL AND COKE CONSTITUTE LESS THAN ONE-FIFTH OF 1 PER CENT OF THE TOTAL COAL AND COKE PRODUCTION WITHIN THE UNITED STATES

(Four hundred and fifty-nine million seven hundred and sixteen thousand one hundred and four tons total production; 836,769 tons total imports in 1931)

Never in the long history of the protective tariff has it been seriously proposed to levy an import duty under such circumstances. Most of this tiny trickle of foreign coal now entering the country is a high-quality anthracite and none of it undersells domestic anthracite. Actually the foreign coal commands a premium of around a dollar a ton.

II. THE PROPOSED COAL TARIFF PRODUCES NO APPRECIABLE REVENUE

That a $2 import tax on coal will yield little or nothing to the Treasury is not merely the contention of the opponents of this tariff absurdity. It is a fact conceded by both sides. The Treasury submitted a nominal estimate of $500,000 revenue on this item, which has since been reduced by the proposal to permit free importation of Canadian coal. But the Pennsylvania anthracite operators are proceeding on the theory that this tax will act as a complete embargo, otherwise it is of no conceivable benefit to them.

III. THE TARIFF COMMISSION HAS NEITHER RECOMMENDED NOR REPORTED, NOR EVEN INVESTIGATED—THE COAL-TARIFF PROPOSITION

In this as in other aspects of the case, the coal tariff clause in the present revenue bill is positively unique and without even semblance of plausible claim for protection. Oil and copper and lumber have been the subjects of recent exhaustive Tariff Commission reports. As to coal, nothing.

IV. THE IMPOSITION OF A COAL TARIFF INVITES FOREIGN RETALIATION DETRIMENTAL TO OUR FOREIGN TRADE IN COAL AND IN OTHER COMMODITIES

Certainly it ought to require the most desperate need of protection (of which in the present instance there is not the slightest need) to warrant incurring the risks to our foreign trade involved in levying any new tariffs at this time. Such tariffs add fuel to the flames of present foreign resentment. The "joker" inserted in the coal paragraph in the Senate bill intending to exempt Canadian coal, in the hope of avoiding Canadian exclusion of American coal, is in reality an open invitation to Canada and Great Britain to put into effect a similar edict. This would operate in reverse fashion and exclude our coal from their market, for we sell to them more than we buy. But is there any reason to suppose that retaliation will necessarily be limited to coal? Instead there is every reason to expect it will go beyond that.

V. OUR EXPORTS OF COAL AND COKE ARE IN THE RATIO OF 16 TO 1 WITH OUR IMPORTS

(Thirteen million eighty-eight thousand two hundred and fifty-nine tons of coal and coke went out of the country last year and 836,769 tons came in.) The value of our coal exports was $54,984,000 and of coke $3,494,000. Shall we jeopardize this trade at the behest and for the imagined benefit of a small group of coal operators in a small area of a single State (Pennsylvania)?

VI. DISTRESS AND UNEMPLOYMENT IN COAL INDUSTRY NOT VALID ARGUMENT FOR THIS TARIFF

The proponents of the coal-tariff embargo have adroitly sought to capitalize our national sympathy for the vast army of unemployed coal miners. The fact is that there are two coal industries, bituminous and anthracite. Imports of coal and its exclusion or otherwise has not the remotest relation to the predicament of the bituminous industry or its relief, for it requires a miscroscope to discover any imports of foreign bituminous coal. As to the Pennsylvania anthracite industry, the exclusion of foreign anthracite from the New England seaboard market (the only point in the country where it is sold) might conceivably permit the increase of sales of Pennsylvania anthracite by less than 1 per cent. (Pennsylvania now supplies 93 per cent of all the anthracite sold in New England.) What a travesty to contend that this trivial item is a major factor in the employment problem!

VII. THE MYTH OF THE MENACE OF CHINESE AND RUSSIAN COAL

(of which the proponents of a coal tariff have made so much talk.)

No coal from China last year—one cargo of approximately 5,000 tons this year—no more in sight. If China gave its coal away it would rarely pay to freight it across the Pacific to our own shores. From Russia, 216,990 tons of anthracite reached our shores last year. That is less than a single day's production in our own anthracite-coal field. The Finance Committee record disclosed that shipments of Russian coal are not increasing—and will not increase. Coal is not like matches. Freight and handling are the major costs. Transoceanic shipments of coal require ships. The most cursory examination of the facts evidences that Russia's ambitions to expand her foreign trade won't work when it comes to coal. An occasional shipload of selected anthracite at a premium price for a seaboard customer—yes. But a deluge, no. And as for the talk about Russian convict labor, we already have law enough on the statute books to bar the import of any product of convict labor. So far as the present fight on the coal tariff is concerned, this is just one more bogey man to frighten Congress and befuddle the issue.

VIII. LAST, BUT NOT LEAST, THE AMERICAN CONSUMER

His interests certainly are not promoted by establishing an embargo, whether it be on imported coal or on any other commodity. The granting of monopolies is not usually supposed to tend either to lower prices or to improve quality and service. The question of fuel is a vital one to the home owner. Why prejudice his interests in so vain and preposterous a proposition as this coal-tariff-tax embargo?

WASHINGTON, May 17, 1932.

BOSTON, March 28, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senator from Massachusetts, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I note that the House favors a tax of 10 cents each 100 pounds on foreign anthracite and coke. This tax will yield no revenue; it will act as an embargo. A revenue tax of 25 or 35 cents a ton would yield not over $250,000.

Our company owns and controls some of the largest mines in the United States. We are also importing some foreign coal and coke. The total importations of foreign anthracite coal, compared with the production in the State of Pennsylvania alone, amount to slightly over 1 per cent. The bulk of this foreign anthracite coal and coke has been coming to New England and has been to the public benefit.

In order to meet foreign competition the Pennsylvania anthracite companies have vastly improved the quality of their product, removing the slate and bone from their coal, which they formerly shipped to this market.

Speaking for myself, I hope you will use your influence against an unreasonable tax on coke and coal, which would act as an embargo and not a revenue producer.

Yours very truly,

THE NORTH AMERICAN COAL CORPORATION,
By JOS. W. GORMAN, Vice President.

P. S.—We export many times the amount of coal we import. If you care for exact tonnages, I will be glad to furnish them to you.—J. W. G.

BOSTON, May 6, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I note what you are doing for the consumer in New England about the proposed tariff on coal. I have also read Walter Lippmann's views with approval.

I happen to be not only a constituent in Massachusetts, where anthracite coal comes in to the consumer, but also a corporate officer in a landlord corporation in Pennsylvania. The tenant operating company ships anthracite coal to Toronto, Canada, which there is sold to the house of industry and depended upon for supplying the unemployed with coal to keep them from freezing in winter.

The retaliatory duty on American anthracite which Canada would undoubtedly put on would have two results.

The Toronto unemployed would be much colder and suffer hardships.

A perfectly good Pennsylvania industry would be ruined. The general ruin in that business in selling anthracite to Canada would far exceed any benefit to be obtained by putting a duty on the anthracite which comes into Boston by water.

Yours very truly,

RICHARD W. HALE.

TO-DAY AND TO-MORROW

By Walter Lippmann

COAL AND OIL TARIFFS: HAS THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY SURRENDERED?

Under the pretense of raising revenue the House has proposed to erect tariffs against petroleum products and coal. The Senate Finance Committee has tentatively added a copper tariff and there is a powerful agitation for additional tariffs on lumber.

The insincerity of the performance is visible in the House bill. For the petroleum and coal taxes differ from all the other excise taxes, such as those laid upon toilet preparations, furs, jewelry, automobiles, in that these taxes "apply only with respect to the importation of such articles." Plainly the object is not to raise revenue but to prevent imports. Thus the coal tariff, which is at the rate of $2 a short ton, is estimated to yield only $1,500,000. Were the same tax applied for revenue purposes to all coal consumed in the United States in 1930 (I do not have the figures for 1931) it would yield theoretically a billion dollars. Obviously the House was not interested in revenues. It was interested in stopping the imports of Canadian and British coal. This proposal has nothing to do with the raising of revenue.

Let us look then at the meaning of this coal tariff. In 1930 the United States produced 70,000,000 tons of anthracite. It exported 2,500,000 tons and imported 675,000. In other words, it imported less than one ton for every 100 tons produced and consumed. It exported more than four tons for every ton imported. On what theory of tariffs does an industry with a monopoly of more than 99 per cent of the domestic market and, in addition, an excess of exports, require protection?

Take next bituminous coal. In 1930 there were produced 630,000,000 tons. There were exported nearly 16,000,000 tons. There were imported only 241,000 tons. What fraction of 1 per cent is 241,000 in relation to 630,000,000? Can it be denied that the bituminous and coal producers of the United States have more than 99 per cent of the domestic market? At whom are they aiming the tariff?

They are aiming it at Canada. There is a trifling amount of coal produced in Nova Scotia and Alberta, in Saskatchewan and New Brunswick. A little of it finds its way into Maine and Vermont and into Washington, Montana, Idaho, and Alaska because transportation conditions are favorable. This is the trade that Congress proposes to stop. But just consider the mentality of this proceeding. While we buy from Canada a microscopic fraction of 1 per cent of the coal we consume, we sell to Canada 85 per cent of our coal exports. Though we receive from Canada almost none of the coal we consume, we sell to Canada as much coal as Canada produces.

Thus in order to stop a fraction of 1 per cent of our consumption from coming in we are proposing to endanger 85 per cent of our export trade. For it is humanly certain that Canada will not tamely submit. On July 15 an imperial conference meets at Ottawa for the purpose of uniting the Empire under preferential tariffs. Could there be greater folly than to select this moment to impose a punitive tariff against a Canadian industry?

Really, when one examines the facts, when one considers what Congress is risking for an insignificant advantage to an insignificant part of the American coal trade, it is difficult to refrain from wondering whether Congress is in its right mind.

The proposed oil tariff is a little bit more complicated, but not much. The demand for this tariff comes from the so-called independent producers in Texas and Oklahoma who believe that domestic oil would replace imports and the price of oil would rise if prohibitive duties were imposed. They are supported by the coal producers, who hope by raising the price of oil to discourage the complication of oil with coal.

In 1931 the total value of our exports of petroleum products was three times as great as the value of our imports. This is fairly conclusive evidence that whatever else the industry may be suffering from it is not suffering from inability to compete in the world market. Indeed the figures bear out this conclusion. In 1930 the United States produced 63.3 per cent of the crude oil of the world. It imported about 7 per cent of what it produced. Thus the domestic producers had 93 per cent of the domestic market. Does anyone think they can monopolize the American market and hold their own in the world markets as well? Not in an era when every country in the world is under the strongest pressure, owing to our unbalanced position as a creditor nation, to buy as little as possible from the United States. The oil producers are playing with dynamite when they adopt a policy of tariff aggression. They are penny wise and pound foolish.

Here, then, are two tariff measures which might be described as farthest north in the effort to strangle international trade. Not even the authors of the Hawley-Smoot tariff ventured to enact measures so patently indefensible. Yet the coal and oil tariffs were voted by a House controlled by the Democrats. Democratic votes are deciding the issue in the Senate committee.

What are the Democratic leaders going to do about this scandal? It makes ridiculous their whole case against the Republican tariff policy. Is it possible that the presidential candidates who have been criticizing the tariff in general terms, that the Democratic Party which has given out tons of printed matter on the tariff, will do nothing to stop these silly tariffs which, if enacted, can only stultify the Democrats completely on one of the chief issues of the coming campaign?

If the Democratic leaders are ever going to speak out, this is the time for them to do it. Once these tariffs are made law the country will laugh at their protests.

DOMESTIC FUEL CORPORATION,
New York, May 10, 1932.

The Hon. DAVID WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are attaching hereto an article by Mr. Walter Lippmann, which is along the lines of articles written by Mr. Claude Bowers, of the Hearst publications, and Mr. Kent, of the Baltimore Sun.

We believe that this article expresses the situation very concretely as to the proposed tariff items in the revenue bill, from the Democratic viewpoint.

We are, of course, most directly interested in the coal and coke tariff, and we feel that most of the coal trade is against the proposed coal tariff, and that retaliation from Canada will do far greater harm than the tariff could possibly do good. On the other hand, for the coke tariff there is absolutely no justification at all, as it was pointed out to the Finance Committee that the coke imports to this country over the past five years decreased over 40 per cent, whereas coke production along the Atlantic seaboard in New Jersey, New York, and Massachusetts increased in these States, respectively, 2½ per cent, 20 per cent, and 44½ per cent. We feel that under such conditions the most zealous protectionists in the world could not advocate a tariff for the monopolized coke industry.

We sincerely hope you will use your efforts to defeat the proposed coal and coke tariff embargo, or at least reduce it to a fair amount of, say, 50 cents per ton for the coal, which might bring in some revenue and would not be an absolute embargo and, on the other hand, eliminate coke entirely.

Yours faithfully,

J. P. ROUTH, President.

BRIEF OF SENATOR WALSH OF MASSACHUSETTS AGAINST THE DUTY ON COAL

THE COAL TARIFF

House bill, 10 cents per 100 pounds.

Senate Finance Committee, 10 cents per 100 pounds.

The Finance Committee, although it retained the House rate, added the following provision:

"The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles, and shall not be imposed upon any such article if during the preceding calendar year the exports of the articles described in this paragraph from the United States to the country from which such article is imported have been greater in quantity than the imports into the United States from such country of the articles described in this paragraph."

The effect of this provision is the placing of a duty only on the imports of coal from those countries who export to this country more than this country exports to them. Great Britain and Russia are the only countries who export more coal to the United States than they import from us. In 1931 we imported 305,945 tons from Great Britain and 216,990 tons from Russia, while our exports to both of these countries were negligible.

The inclusion of taxes on imported commodities in a revenue bill sets a dangerous and unwise precedent. Particularly is this true when the rates levied on the several commodities are so excessive as to constitute absolute embargoes, thereby eliminating all possibility of raising any revenue by them.

The rate of 10 cents per 100 pounds of coal, equivalent to $2 per net ton and $2.24 per gross ton, provided for in the revenue bill as it passed the House, and retained in the bill approved by the Senate Finance Committee, is acknowledged by tax experts, proponents and opponents, as constituting an embargo. It is not expected nor estimated that this provision of the revenue bill will raise revenue. Upon what theory of tax-bill legislation is a tax that does not raise revenue made a part of a revenue bill? Even if the deplorable condition of the coal industry warranted and could be improved by the tariff protection provided, there is no justification for making it a part of a revenue bill.

This is an outrageous example of legislative "hitch-hiking," because the distress in the coal industry can not be alleviated through tariff or revenue legislation, a fact disclosed by thorough investigation.

The Department of Commerce figures for the year 1931 show that we exported in total 13,088,295 tons of coal and coke, and during the same year we imported a total of 832,769 tons of coal and coke, or an export balance in our favor of about 16 to 1. The above total export figures are made up as follows:

	Tons
Bituminous coal	10,827,000
Anthracite coal	1,587,775
Coke	673,484
Total	13,088,259

In 1930 this country exported 14,176,236 tons of coal.

In 1931 our total import figures on coal and coke were:

	Tons
Bituminous coal	179,947
Anthracite coal	569,599
Coke	86,223
Total	832,769

In 1931 the production of coal and coke in the United States was as follows:

	Tons
Bituminous coal	378,110,000
Anthracite coal	59,115,378
By-product coke	32,454,604
Beehive coke	1,273,000
Total	470,952,982

Let us analyze the meaning of these figures. In 1931 we produced over 470,000,000 tons of coal and imported considerably less than 1,000,000 tons, the ratio of imports as compared with domestic production being less than one-fifth of 1 per cent.

Our exports were over 13,000,000 tons, exceeding imports by 16 to 1. Think of it—for every ton imported this country exported 16 tons. On what theory of tariffs does an industry with a monopoly of nearly 100 per cent of the domestic market and, in addition, a tremendous excess of exports over imports, require embargo protection?

It is a generally accepted principle that tariff benefits should only be extended in cases where the imported article undersells the American-produced commodity. Even the relatively infinitesimal amount of coal imported into this country is sold at from 50 cents to $1 more per ton than domestic coal of the same grade. Furthermore, it is interesting to note that it is held by many industrial experts that one of the great ills with the anthracite-coal industry, the coal group that is principally demanding a coal tariff, is that coal prices are entirely too high in relation to other commodities.

Astounding as it may be when one considers the universal decline in commodity prices, the prices of pea and buckwheat anthracite, which constitute 70 per cent of the coal consumed in New York City, have been increased during the past three years, as shown below:

Pea:
1930	9.25
1931	10.50
Buckwheat:
1929	7.15
1931	7.50

The sponsors of this measure have aroused our sympathy by painting a true and doleful picture of the widespread unemployment in the coal industry. It is estimated that 40,000 American coal miners are entirely destitute of remunerative occupations, and it is maintained by the advocates of this tariff that its enactment would result in returning these unfortunate miners back to work in the domestic coal mines. Such an achievement would be doubly commendable in times such as these, but they deceive themselves in supposing that the exclusion of all of the coal imported into this country would appreciably affect the unemployment problem.

According to the statistics on coal appearing in the latest publication of the Bureau of Mines Coal in 1929, Table 1–A, pages 824–825, the average output per man per day is 1.93 gross tons, and the average number of days worked is 225.

The idle miners have, therefore, a productive capacity of 80,000 tons per day, and 20,000,000 tons per year. Imports, however, only amount to 2½ per cent of their productive capacity, which means that even the most sanguine view of the matter can not anticipate the reemployment of more than 1,000 of the idle miners, and this is based upon the maintenance of the present export volume.

The crux of this coal-tariff problem is, can this country adopt an embargo policy on coal imports and at the same time retain our present foreign markets for American coal?

Ninety per cent of our coal and coke exports go to Canada; 65 per cent of our imports come from England and Canada. Canada and Great Britain are bitter over the American high-tariff policy; both have passed drastic retaliation tariffs since the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley bill. The present Canadian Government won office a year and a half ago on the anti-American tariff issue. Other units of the British Empire have likewise been aroused.

This July the British Empire Tariff Conference is scheduled to begin its sessions at Ottawa, Canada. The Dominion Government is expected to lead the fight at the imperial conference for a tighter all-British tariff union in general, and a stiffer front against the United States in particular.

With the whole British Empire already incensed because of our tariff law and threatening to enlarge upon the severity of the retaliatory measures they have already adopted, our statesmen propose the diplomatic procedure of adding this and several other embargoes to our present list of excessive tariffs. It is adding insult to injury.

The British Empire is our best customer. We should be making every effort to placate their bitterness, but if instead we adopt this coal tariff, our exports to Canada are going to be shut out.

Consider the mentality of this procedure. While we buy a microscopic fraction of 1 per cent of the coal we consume, we sell to Canada 90 per cent of our exports. We sell to Canada almost as much coal as she produces, our exports amounting to over 11,000,000 tons a year.

The Canadian coal producers have for a long time been demanding that their Government increase their present coal tariff. The tariff we propose to enact will exclude every ton of coal Great Britain now ships to us. It is inevitable that at the July conference in Ottawa Great Britain will request the Dominion Government to provide a market for the British coal the United States has been receiving, and past experience indicates that Canada will raise her tariff against non-British coal imports. The Dominion Government will undoubtedly adopt an embargo tariff at least as high as ours.

If we pass this coal tariff, the American coal miners will be the losers. For the insignificant advantage of shutting out about half a million tons of coal we will lose a market for 11,000,000 tons. Unemployment and distress in the coal regions will be greatly aggravated. Many members of the domestic coal and coke trade recognize this danger and are not sympathetic with the Finance Committee proposal, because it places their industries in greater jeopardy.

A great deal has been said about the imports of Russian indentured or forced-labor coal and coolie-mined Chinese coal threatening the American market. There is already a law prohibiting the importation of articles mined or produced by forced labor, and if any such coal is coming in from Russia the Treasury Department should stop it. Less than 25 per cent of the coal imported in 1931 came from Russia.

Chinese coal will never be imported in substantial quantities. In 1931 only 5,000 tons came in. The only American company that has imported coal from China testified that it was a very unprofitable venture. Twelve thousand miles of sea transportation is too long a voyage. Shipping rates are too high, and the three months consumed in shipping the cargo ties up the money invested, thus adding greatly to the high cost of financing such a business.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I am indeed pleased to learn that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry reported another agricultural measure this morning, being Senate bill 4536, which has the indorsement of the National Grange, the National Farmers' Union, and the Farm Bureau Federation. I can assure the distinguished chairman of the committee that this action will indeed hearten the farmers throughout the land.

This measure gives two mandates to the Federal Farm Board. First, the board must conduct its investigation to see what the conditions are relative to any commodity when requested to do so by an agricultural advisory committee, cooperative organization, other farm organization, or on its own motion. Second, after certain conditions are found to exist the Farm Board must put into operation the equalization fee, the debenture, or the allotment plan, or combination thereof.

Whenever the board, after investigation, finds the following conditions to exist, it is required to make a public declaration of these findings and to assist the farmers to secure at least the cost of production for that portion of the crop sold in the domestic market, by utilizing one of the three alternative plans authorized in the bill. The conditions to be determined are:

First. Whether there is or may be a seasonal surplus or a year's total surplus.

Second. Whether the provisions of section 5 of the agricultural marketing act, providing for loans to cooperative associations and stabilization corporations, will be effective to control such surpluses.

Third. Whether the cost of production is in excess of the prevailing market price secured by growers and what quantity of the commodity will be required for domestic consumption.

Fourth. Whether the durability, methods of marketing, and conditions of processing of the commodity make it adaptable to marketing under any of the plans authorized in the bill.

Whenever the board undertakes one of the three plans, it is required to continue its operations until the conditions making necessary such operations have been corrected and further operations are unnecessary or inadvisable.

The board is directed to ascertain the cost of production of the commodity in question and it shall be the goal of the operations conducted under any of these three plans to secure a price to the farmer which will at least return his cost of production.

Title I of the bill embodies the equalization-fee plan; Title II of the bill embodies the export-debenture plan; Title III of the bill embodies the domestic-allotment plan.

I do not desire at this time to detain the Senate with a detailed exposition of any of these plans. The equalization-fee plan is quite familiar to most of the Senators, as it has been passed by Congress twice. The export-debenture plan likewise is familiar, having been considered and approved by the Senate previously. The domestic-allotment plan, although it has not been considered on the floor of this body as much in detail as the other plans, has been introduced at length before both Agricultural Committees and by Congress. Senators will find a detailed explanation of these plans in the hearings of the Senate and House Committees on Agriculture of this Congress.

There is nothing novel or new about giving the board several alternative plans with which to cope with the agricultural problem. We have done the same thing with reference to other Federal agencies. For example, the Federal Reserve Board is cloaked with a variety of powers in aiding the banking industry of this country; the Interstate Commerce Commission has numerous other powers besides rate-making powers; the United States Shipping Board likewise has numerous alternative proposals available for promoting the shipping industry. The agricultural problem is so diverse and conditions are so different in various parts of the country, and also so different with reference to the marketing problems of various commodities, that perhaps no one plan is best suited for all commodities under all conditions.

The three plans embodied in this bill represent the three outstanding proposals for dealing with the surplus problem. Each of them, in one form or another, has been approved by eminent economists. By placing at the disposal of the Federal Farm Board all three methods of coping with the surplus problem, its power and ability to really solve this problem are immeasurably enhanced.

One of the most significant things about this measure is that for the first time the national farm organizations of the country have agreed upon one bill. This measure was presented to and explained to both the Senate Committee on Agriculture and the House Committee on Agriculture by Chester H. Gray, Washington representative of the American Farm Bureau Federation, on behalf of the National Grange, the National Farmers' Union, and the American Farm Bureau Federation. It represents, therefore, the matured judgment of the three farm organizations. Organized agriculture is united as never before in the history of this country. They have decided after years of study and numerous conferences upon a specific plan which they believe will bring relief to agriculture and restore it to its rightful place in this Nation.

I wish to commend the Senate Committee on Agriculture and its distinguished chairman for heeding the recommendations and pleas of the farmers of this country by deciding to report favorably the measure which the farmers desire.

The burden of responsibility, therefore, is now clearly upon this body. The farmers have presented their appeals again and again to Congress. They have presented a specific proposition which they believe will bring adequate relief. Shall Congress turn a deaf ear to organized agriculture? Is it going to ignore the distress of the farmers from coast to coast, or is it going to be satisfied to adjourn and confess to the farmers that they heard the pleas of their spokesmen in Washington but did nothing about it, despite the recommendations of its Agricultural Committee?

Mr. President, it is difficult for me to believe that this body, having so many Members representing predominantly rural constituencies, and having no Member who does not represent a substantial number of farmers, will deliberately slap the farmers of the country in the face by hearing their pleas for relief and doing nothing about it. As a practical matter, however, it is time that we faced frankly and courageously the fact that the session is drawing rapidly to a close, unless we are to continue far into the summer. We must act quickly if we are to bring agriculture relief. I appeal to this body not to put off this long-deferred responsibility but promptly to pass this measure, which the farmers have requested, following the disposal of the tax bill, thus rendering possible relief to some extent during this calendar year.

Mr. President, agriculture must be rescued.

ADDITIONAL PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted at a community mass meeting held in celebration of World Good Will Day, May 17, 1932, at Brooklyn, N. Y., favoring the prompt ratification of the World Court protocols, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Meat Cutters and Butchers Local, No. 1, A. M. C. & B. W. of N. A., of Syracuse, N. Y., favoring the adoption of a plan for an adequate prosperity loan to finance construction of public works, which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Central Trades and Labor Assembly of Syracuse and vicinity, Syracuse, N. Y., favoring the floatation of a bond issue, the proceeds to be devoted to a great national program of public works, which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Homer, N. Y., praying for the passage of the so-called Brookhart bill to regulate the motion-picture industry, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Rochester, N. Y., praying for the adoption of a 25-year debt moratorium plan, as suggested by railroad leaders, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Rockville Center (N. Y.) Republican Club, favoring the prompt repeal of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution and the passage of legislation legalizing the manufacture and sale of light wines and beers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Oriskany Falls, N. Y., favoring the adoption of dry enforcement planks in the national party conventions, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Lavere-Harrington Post, No. 2320, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, of Oswego, N. Y., favoring the passage of the so-called Gasque bill, for the benefit of widows and orphans of veterans of the World War, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a paper signed by sundry citizens of New York City and vicinity, N. Y., indorsing the petition for a redress of grievances recently presented to Congress by the National Economy Committee, praying for retrenchment in Federal expenditures, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Lavere-Harrington Post, No. 2320, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, of Oswego, N. Y., protesting against cuts in appropriations for the Army, training camps, officers, enlisted men, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Washington Heights Welfare League and Tenants Association, New York, opposing any reduction in the compensation of postal clerks and carriers, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Utica (N. Y.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring retrenchment in governmental expenditures, and protesting against the passage of the so-called Goldsborough bill, to stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Dansville (N. Y.) Board of Trade, favoring retrenchment in governmental expenditures and the balancing of the Budget, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Square Table Club, of New York City, N. Y., protesting against the passage of legislation "withholding the pay and allowance of 2,000 officers of the Regular Army, on the ground that such action would cripple our system of national defense," which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Rochester, N. Y., praying for reductions in governmental expenditures to the extent of $600,000,000, so as to balance the Budget, and the adoption of the general sales tax plan in the pending revenue bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Rochester, N. Y., praying for support of the economy and tax program of the President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Rome (N. Y.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring the prompt balancing of the Budget and retrenchment in governmental expenditures, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the common council of the city of Olean, N. Y., favoring the granting of Federal unemployment relief to municipalities, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of the State of New York, remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on the automobile industry, and favoring the adoption of some form of general tax in place thereof in the pending revenue bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

REVENUE AND TAXATION—AMENDMENT

Mr. COPELAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10236, the revenue and taxation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF THE POST OFFICE COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably sundry nominations of postmasters, which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee proposing an import tax on coal, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate, I should like to say that there are over 80 companies in the anthracite region competing for business; that there is at the present time a price war on among all these companies; that the price of anthracite has been reduced by from 75 cents to $1.50 a ton; and the competition is very keen among them. I wanted Senators to know those facts before they vote on the particular item in the revenue bill which is now pending.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, notwithstanding the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, I desire to say that these prices are fixed by a combination who own the anthracite coal fields. There is not any competitive price in this matter. There is no use in trying to mislead the Senate into the supposition that there is any competition as to prices. I ask to insert here several pages from the report of the United States Coal Commission.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY ANALYSIS

The United States Supreme Court has formally decided in several cases that combinations in restraint of trade exist in the anthracite coal-mining industry. Orders for dissolution have been made. Proceedings are now in progress before the United States District Courts for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania and the Southern District of New York with the object in view of restoring at least in part competitive conditions in the production and distribution of anthracite coal.

MONOPOLY CONDITIONS WHICH HAVE PREVAILED

The monopoly and other conditions which have been condemned and ordered dissolved by the Supreme Court have manifested themselves as follows:

1. Concentration in ownership and control of coal-mining operations and of coal-land reserves by the railroads traversing the different anthracite fields.

2. Development of a community of interest between the seven anthracite coal-carrying railroad systems. This community of interest has prevented the construction of competitive transportation facilities, and which has stabilized traffic and allocated tonnage to each railroad in accordance with certain agreed-upon ratios of the total anthracite output.

3. The imposition of unwarranted capital charges upon the industry. Indefensible costs have been imposed upon the industry by the payment of excessive prices in order to secure possession or control of coal lands. Large issues of excess capitalization have also been made to buy out or consolidate competing coal companies or projected railroads. Losses sustained by the railroad coal companies in discriminating against and eliminating independent producers have also been capitalized.

Prior to the war practically many of the coal-producing companies of the combination were operated at a loss and were maintained by advances made by the parent railroad corporation. The major part of these losses were afterwards capitalized and the dividend and interest requirements for these securities, as well as for the excess capitalization issued to overcome competition in other ways, constitute a permanent burden upon the consumer of anthracite coal. Profits, largely derived from freight rates that have been adjudged excessive, also have been capitalized by means of stock dividends.

4. The concealment of excessive monopoly profits. Primarily to evade antimonopoly and freight rate laws, separate corporations or legal entities have been created to carry on the production and distribution of coal. Before 1900, by charging excessive freight rates and granting indirect rebates to their own coal-producing and coal-selling companies, the anthracite railroads made it impossible for most of the independent operators to mine and ship coal at a profit, and, although the mining companies owned by the railroads so far as information was available showed operating losses, these were more than offset by the monopoly gains secured by the combinations through the imposition of unreasonable freight rates.

Prior to the war, therefore, as a general rule, the main profits of the combination were taken by the railroad companies. However, with the increase in the price of coal, and the elimination of competition because of excessive freight rates, not only were large monopoly profits taken by the transportation companies, but at the same time, margins of profit also accrued to the coal-producing and coal-sales companies—the other branches of the monopoly which previously had in general been profitless. These latter margins of profit, however, were all that came to public notice and even the information as to these profits was not complete. The producers of anthracite coal were therefore enabled to contend that the profits of the industry were not excessive, when, as a matter of fact, there were large and unwarranted elements of additional profits to the combination, such as those accruing from coal-sales companies and high freight rates, which, on the surface, seemed to arise from independent undertakings and did not appear to be constituent elements of unwarranted monopoly gains.

5. Coordination and stabilization attained through the fiscal agents of the combination. From a superficial view of the monopoly conditions in the production and distribution of anthracite coal, it appears that the combination consists of seven independent groups of corporations, each group centering about one of the seven anthracite coal-carrying railroads. More exhaustive investigation, however, leads to the conclusion that these seven seemingly independent and competing groups are actually coordinated and carry on their operations in thorough accord through a common community of interest and according to a well-defined policy of coal monopolization and stabilization of railroad traffic conditions. The history of the anthracite industry since 1900 shows united action in eliminating competition in the production and sale of coal by interests outside of the combination and in preventing the development of railroad systems to compete with those in the combination. Moreover, there has been a clearly defined and constantly maintained apportionment of traffic to each of the seven railroad systems in the anthracite combination.

The investigations made by the Interstate Commerce Commission and other official agencies, such as the so-called Money Trust investigation in 1913 (report of committee to investigate the concentration of control of money and credit, 1913, 3d sess., 62d Cong., H. Rept. No. 1453), as well as the evidence presented to the United States District and Supreme Courts, clearly demonstrate that this coordination of all the elements in the anthracite monopoly have been effected through the fiscal agents of the anthracite railroads. A group of private bankers and financiers, headed by the banking house of J. P. Morgan & Co., originally moved, no doubt, by the laudable purpose of bringing about stability in the production and traffic of anthracite coal, have been the coordinating and integrating factors in working out the anthracite monopoly. They have not only devised policies but have been the agents of the anthracite interests for eliminating competition, and for securing a common control of coal production and reserves and of railroad facilities. They have also been the medium for apportioning and assuring to each of the units of the combination a proper division of traffic and maintenance of profits.

6. Extension of combination to retail trade. The movement toward consolidation in the retail trade, with close affiliation with the railroad producing interest, culminated in January, 1923, with the incorporation of the National Coal Corporation under the laws of New Jersey. According to the Commercial and Financial Chronicle, this corporation has been organized for the purpose of taking over the most important retail distributing companies of New York, Boston, and Chicago.

THE FUNDAMENTAL QUESTION AT ISSUE

These are the conclusions which are apparent from the judicial and administrative investigations of the anthracite industry during the past 20 years. There can be no doubt as to the existence of monopoly conditions. The Supreme Court of the United States in 1920 finally decided that such conditions exist and ordered their elimination.

The Supreme Court, however, is restricted to legal considerations. It can only dissolve an illegal combination or one which contravenes the actual or technical prohibitions of the law. The significant question in the present situation, therefore, especially in the light of past developments in the industry, is whether or not the firm and unequivocal action of the Supreme Court in the pending cases can actually result in the dissolution of the anthracite monopoly, or whether there will be a dissolution in form only while the community of interest and the monopoly conditions will continue to exist with all of their present disadvantageous economic and social effect.

The history of past attempts to accomplish this same object, as well as an examination of the underlying economic facts and forces themselves, clearly indicate that, although the efforts of the Department of Justice and of the Supreme Court may be effective from a legal standpoint when the problem is considered from its more fundamental economic and social aspects, judicial efforts to break up the anthracite combination will probably be entirely barren of result. The community of interest may still obtain and unreasonable profits may be merely shifted from one agency to another. On the other hand, the question presents itself as to whether the restoration of conditions of free competition would be beneficial from a public standpoint. Stabilization in output and regularity in meeting consumption might thereby be destroyed, and profits and prices increased beyond the level established by the existing combination.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I insist that there is real competition among them. As I understand, now, since prices have dropped, Russian anthracite coal sells a little higher; but I have been reliably informed that a few months ago Russian anthracite was selling below the price of Pennsylvania anthracite.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll to develop the presence of a quorum.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Davis	Kendrick	Shipstead
Austin	Dickinson	Keyes	Shortridge
Bailey	Dill	King	Smith
Barbour	Fess	La Follette	Smoot
Barkley	Fletcher	Lewis	Steiwer
Bingham	Frazier	Long	Stephens
Blaine	George	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Goldsborough	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Gore	Metcalf	Townsend
Brookhart	Harrison	Morrison	Trammell
Broussard	Hastings	Moses	Tydings
Bulkley	Hatfield	Neely	Vandenberg
Bulow	Hawes	Norris	Walcott
Capper	Hayden	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Carey	Hebert	Oddie	Walsh, Mont.
Cohen	Howell	Pittman	Watson
Connally	Hull	Reed	Wheeler
Coolidge	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.	White
Copeland	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Costigan	Kean	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on the committee amendment as to coal, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is necessarily absent. I do not know how he would vote if present. I am unable to secure a transfer, and therefore will have to withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL].

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is detained from the Senate on account of illness. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BINGHAM. Has the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have a general pair with the Senator from Virginia and therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, he would vote "nay"; and if I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HAWES. I have a pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts (after having voted in the negative). For the purpose of moving a reconsideration at a later stage, I desire to change my vote from "nay" to "yea."

Mr. HAYDEN. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is necessarily absent and that he is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is necessarily detained from the Senate by illness in his family. If present, he would vote "nay."

I also desire to announce the necessary absence from the city of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

Mr. HULL. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] is necessarily absent from the Senate on account of illness.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY]; and

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 34, as follows:

YEAS—39

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I desire to enter a motion for a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion will be entered.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Tydings beer and reconstruction amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion will be entered. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 244, after line 5, to insert:

(6) Lumber, rough, or planed or dressed on one or more sides, $3 per thousand feet, board measure; but the tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

Mr. JONES obtained the floor.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph which has just been reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield for that purpose?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 244, line 7, after the word "measure," the Senator from Florida proposes to insert the following:

(8) Phosphate rock (phosphorites, collophane, and apatites) containing more than 70 per cent of tribasic phosphate of lime, 8 cents per hundred pounds.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, is that intended as an amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. TRAMMELL. It is proposed as an amendment to the lumber amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, of course I shall ask a separate vote on the committee amendment, which is distinct from what the Senator from Florida suggests.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield so that I may get an understanding of what is going on?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Is what the Senator is about to discuss an amendment exactly the same as the amendment contained on page 244?

Mr. JONES. It is the committee amendment with reference to lumber.

Mr. TYDINGS. I mean the Senator has offered no amendment different from the wording on that page?

Mr. JONES. No; I have not.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. We will pass on the amendment of the Senator from Florida when it comes up, I suppose, at the proper time.

Mr. President, I shall not take the time of the Senate to repeat the arguments and the statements which have been made with reference to these other amendments. They are applicable to the pending amendment just as they were applicable to the other amendments, and I think even more so.

I do not dispute that this is a protective tariff amendment, although it is not particularly intended as such. If it were a distinctively protective tariff amendment it would be framed differently.

This is an amendment which I proposed in the committee in the interest of the laboring men of my State. I do not think it would affect the interests of the consumers at all. It would not increase the retail price of lumber in New York or the other lumber markets of the United States to any degree whatever. The consumer of lumber, the purchaser at retail rates, would have to pay just as much for lumber if this amendment were not agreed to as he would have to pay if it were agreed to.

The main thing I want to call to the attention of the Senate is labor, the condition of labor, and the conditions in the lumber sections of the country. I think the conditions with reference to lumber are considerably different in that respect from the conditions in connection with the production of the other articles covered by the amendments which have been proposed to the pending bill.

The lumber affected by this paragraph is largely the lumber of Washington, Oregon, and northern Idaho. The lumber that would be affected by it is the principal product of that section of the country. Upon it depend thousands of homes, representing hundreds of thousands of people. Men, women, and children are practically absolutely dependent for their livelihood, their prosperity, and their happiness upon the lumber products in those sections of the country.

Take away the prosperity of that industry and you take away the prosperity and the livelihood and the happiness of hundreds of thousands of people. It is estimated that in the western part of the State of Washington, for instance, the lumber industry furnishes over a million people with their main element of prosperity, the main basis of wealth; and the happiness of those people rests upon the lumber industry primarily.

What is the condition of that industry to-day? It is practically blocked from any development so that the people who are dependent upon it can get any support from it. It is estimated that there are one hundred and twenty-five or more thousand laborers employed in the lumber industry. It is generally conceded that at this time at least 100,000 of those laborers are idle. Probably taking northern Idaho, western Washington, and Oregon there is a greater number even than that absolutely idle. They have no means of support, they have no labor, aside from the labor furnished by the lumber industry.

That industry is practically idle. As I have said, out of 125,000 laboring men it is conservatively estimated that there are less than 25,000 employed, and they are employed only two or three days out of the week.

The condition of those people can only be imagined. The condition of the localities which are dependent upon that industry can only be imagined. Towns are deserted; cities are without activity. The condition, of course, can be duplicated to a certain exent all over this country of ours, but I do not know of any similar section of the country where those engaged in a particular occupation make up the great mass of the population. The source of prosperity and of happiness to those people and to the communities they inhabit is the lumber industry.

It is in behalf of those people, it is in behalf of those localities and that industry that I am appealing to the Senate for the adoption of this amendment.

I want to say frankly that I do not know whether it will bring the relief we hope for or not. I hope it will bring relief. It may bring some revenue. If imports of lumber come into this country, of course, we will get revenue under this tax. If no such imports come in, then there will be no return from the tax, or whatever we may call it. It is not to be levied upon the people, it is not levied upon the different localities, it is simply to be levied upon the imported articles.

If no lumber from other countries comes in, I expect a development of our own lumber industry. Our imports of lumber from Canada during the last period for which I find information amounted to something over six or seven hundred million feet, mostly of the class of lumber covered by this amendment. So that if no imports from Canada enter our country, we may expect an impetus to our own industry.

There will be some market in this country, possibly. We hope it will improve, and that our people will get it, assuming that there are no imports. As I said, if lumber is shipped in under the tax, we will get the revenue, and to that extent it is a revenue proposition.

The Treasury states that on the ordinary imports which we may expect now the revenues would amount to a million dollars; but the primary purpose, I am frank to confess, is to help our people if we can possibly bring them any help.

I appreciate the argument that is made that this provision should not be in this bill; but it is here, and the other tariff items have been put in. If this will bring some relief to labor, if it will help the labor of our country and furnish them support for themselves and their families, it will be well worth the approval of the United States Senate under the conditions which confront us now.

As I said, the lumber industry is the main industry of those sections of the country. There are no other great industries there. Of course, all the industries in the country are affected by the general stagnation; but where there is a section of the country which depends so largely upon an industry of this character the suffering and the distress are far greater when that great industry is upon its back. That is the situation which confronts us to-day in the lumber industry.

This may not bring the relief we would like to have. We hope that it will. If it does not, it will hurt nobody. This relief ought to be given. It appeals at least to me even more strongly than the other items which we have passed upon, but I have been glad to give my support to them. I am especially glad to give my support here, and to appeal to this body to give the relief that we naturally expect to come from the imposition of a tax which, as I said, will not add one cent to the price paid by the consumer. It will add no burden to anybody in the country if nothing is done by it, and it may help start these mills to work which employ the men who are now without employment and who will get the wages that will furnish comfort and happiness to their homes and families.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. The lumber industry is one industry which no one can accuse of being a monopoly. It is scattered among thousands and thousands of different people. There is no tariff duty that I know of which would be so generally distributed among so many thousands of people in the business as a lumber tariff.

Mr. JONES. The Senator is right in that suggestion. I appreciate very much his statement in regard to it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am totally unfamiliar with the lumber situation. I wonder if the Senator can tell us what is the annual production of lumber and what the importations are and from what countries the importations come?

Mr. JONES. The total production of lumber in this country, according to my recollection, although I have not looked it up especially, is something like 4,000,000,000 or 5,000,000,000 feet. I think it is even greater than that, although I do not know just what the exports are. We did export 2,000,000,000 or 3,000,000,000 feet. The principal source of competitive production is right adjoining our country. The fir and spruce and classes of lumber like that are produced largely in British Columbia. According to the report of the Tariff Commission, which was made just a short time ago, they could lay their lumber down in New York City at about $3.50 less than we could.

It is also true that they have the advantage of all sorts of transportation facilities. On the sea they have foreign ships as well as local ships. Our people are confined by our law to the coastwise trade. It is also true of Canadian lumber interests that they are favored by the railroads and their transportation facilities. The railroads give rebates of various kinds. If they want to encourage an industry, they do it directly. They do it many times by their railroads giving better rates to the industry. They give better rates and they give rebates for the transfer of their lumber products and the products of their lumber industry to get them to the markets of the world. This gives the Canadian lumber interests a very great advantage. They have all sorts of advantages of that sort.

I have had some complaints from the fruit section of our State. They say if we give this rate, Canada will take advantage of it and retaliate against us. Canada is already doing that. Canada has been doing it. I do not say they have been doing it for retaliatory purposes. I say they have put upon the products that come into their country such duties as they think are to their interest. I do not complain of that. Of course, if it is intended as a retaliatory measure, if it is intended to retaliate, that is a different proposition; but if they are looking after their interests, looking after the interests of their own people and their industries, that is exactly what I want the Congress to do for our interests. That is what I want our people to do—to do that which will develop our own industries and those things which will favor our own people and help them in every way that it is possible to do.

What have I said to those fruit producers? "Your market is already gone if the restrictions of Canada will take it away," but further the very best market that can come to our fruit people is the market of a prosperous, happy, and contented labor in the United States. The 125,000 people with their dependents of 200,000 or 300,000 will make a far better market for the fruit of the Yakima Valley and the Wenatchee Valley and other fruit-producing sections of the State of Washington, than any market they can possibly get in Canada. If we can produce our fruit cheaper than they can, they have the market for it and they will come and take it unless perchance they may think we are trying to retaliate against them. That we are not attempting to do. We are simply looking after the interests of our own people and our own industries.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. KING. I hope I am not interrupting the Senator in the continuity of his argument. I ask the Senator if it is not a fact that during the calendar year 1929 the total production in the United States of lumber was nearly 30,000,000,000 feet whereas the total importations of Canadian lumber were only 1,315,000,000 feet.

Mr. JONES. That may be true. As I said a while ago, I do not remember the exact figures.

Mr. KING. And our exports exceeded our imports.

Mr. JONES. That may be true. This is a great country. This is a great people. We may produce a great deal of lumber in this country and consume a great deal of lumber, but the kind of lumber that competes with Canada and that may be displaced by the forests of Canada comes from a certain section. That is especially the class of lumber against which we are seeking to protect our people. But the main thing, as I said, is the possible help that may be given to encourage the development of the lumber industry from the condition in which it now is.

The general principles of a tariff apply to this article just as much as they do to others. The condition which confronts this industry, the condition which confronts our people now, is the condition which we hope to deal with at least to some extent. It will not harm our people. It may help them. We do not know whether it will help or not, but if it does keep any foreign lumber out and we need something to take its place, we will furnish it and we will have it and that will start American labor to work and will start our mills to operating.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator is pleading now for pure protection and not for revenue. If there is any revenue it will be incidental. What he is pleading for is that there shall be an embargo or stoppage of this foreign lumber so that the producers of the American product may have the advantage of the American market.

Mr. JONES. I do not think it is an embargo; but, practically, that is what I am appealing for. I will say that frankly to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH. It is very refreshing to hear the Senator state just what we are driving at in a tax bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES. I do not think that is a proposition about which we should worry. When the bill came over from the House of Representatives it had two items in it, not for revenue but for protection. We have a perfect right to put them in here, and if the Senator can present any proposition that compares with the lumber situation, the situation which confronts our people, I shall be glad to vote for it.

Mr. SMITH. I am not attempting to excuse those who are responsible for the initiation of this bill. I do bemoan the fact that the old historic party to which I belong and to which I have paid allegiance should, in this hour of the travail of America, when we are now considering a bill for the home builders, when there is a bill pending now to provide a plan by which the poverty-stricken and the homeless may have homes, in the same breath be seeking to put an additional price on the material that those poverty-stricken classes must depend upon. Is it true that because it has been contemplated that we shall advance money to those that are without homes in order to enable them to get homes, yet now we are providing the means by which the money that they spend shall go into the pockets of those who produce lumber and not in aid of those who build the homes?

Mr. JONES. Because we do not do one good thing is no reason why we should not do another good thing. I will help the Senator on matters of that kind. I am willing to stay here as long as necessary to take care of situations like that. But does the Senator think that is an excuse for not taking action that we think will do good? Of course, I do not ask the Senator to violate the fundamental principles in which he believes, and I do not criticize him for not doing it; but, as I have said from the beginning, while, of course, this is to a certain extent a protective measure, it is not framed as it would be framed if it were primarily intended as a protective measure. It is intended to meet a peculiar situation that confronts our people and in which at least 750,000 are directly interested; and if it does good, so much the better.

It may be like some other proposals we carry out in the belief that they would do some good, but we eventually find they do not. If it shall do some good, as I believe and hope it will, it seems to me we are justified in doing it, especially under the circumstances presented to us. Of course, it is in accordance with the fundamentals in which I believe, so that I have no compunctions whatever in supporting it.

I do not complain of the Senator looking at it in another way, but I do appeal to Senators, under the peculiar conditions that confront us, with the possibility of some aid to 750,000 people, not to stand upon some technical proposition that this is a tax bill and not a tariff bill, but to relieve these people under the peculiar conditions that confront us.

Mr. SMITH. I just want to make this one further observation. I am just as sympathetic with those who are dependent upon the production of lumber for a livelihood as I am with any others who are suffering.

Mr. JONES. I know the Senator is.

Mr. SMITH. But I can not get the viewpoint of an American legislator that in order to help 150,000 or 200,000 people he should multiply the burden upon 120,000,000 people. That is the vice of this class legislation called the protective tariff. I would join the Senator in voting three or four dollars a thousand on lumber if I could devise some means by which I could furnish the purchasers of the lumber the extra three or four dollars per thousand to buy it. But I do not feel that I am justified in benefiting a certain class and at the same time subtracting from the other class that which they can ill afford to pay.

Mr. JONES. I am not going to take the time to argue the principles of a protective tariff. In my judgment, there will not be a solitary cent of the $3 added to the price which the retailer will get for his lumber or which the actual consumer will pay when he gets his lumber. The Senator may not agree with me in that, but I am just as strongly of that opinion as I can possibly be.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator said a few moments ago that one reason for taking this item up was because the House had put it in the bill. I am unable to find it in the House bill.

Mr. JONES. I did not mean that the House had put the lumber item in the bill. The Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. NORRIS. I obtained that impression from what the Senator said.

Mr. JONES. No. The House put in the bill the oil and coal items, which made the pending measure what might be called a tariff bill, and so we were justified in putting in the lumber item.

Mr. NORRIS. Following the same theory, the same justification would apply to any other commodity that any Senator feels ought to have additional protection?

Mr. JONES. I have no question about that at all.

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad to have the Senator's honest judgment as to that, and I commend him for it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator tell us what the existing duty on lumber is? Is it $1 a thousand?

Mr. JONES. The existing duty is $1 a thousand where the lumber is planed and dressed on more than one side. I think that is the provision of the existing law; I have it before me.

Mr. FLETCHER. Would this item increase that duty?

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, in answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Florida, let me say that the present duty under the existing tariff law is $1 a thousand upon five botanical species of softwood lumber, provided the lumber is dressed upon more than one side. In practical operation about one-half of the softwood lumber that is brought into this country comes in duty free and the other half is dutiable at the rate of $1 per thousand.

Mr. JONES. That is correct. I have the provision of the law before me, and will read it to the Senator from Florida if he desires.

Mr. FLETCHER. I read it not long ago, and I do not care for the details. I think I understand the present law. I was trying to secure information as to the pending item. As I understand, it provides a different classification and increases the present rate of duty?

Mr. JONES. It increases it, I will say to the Senator frankly. It provides for the same tariff on undressed lumber as on dressed lumber. In other words, as I said at the beginning, I did not frame this amendment for the sole purpose and idea of carrying out the protective-tariff theory. If I had done that, I would have framed it differently, but I framed it not only for that purpose but in order to get revenue and to meet the situation which appeals most strongly to me and most strongly to the section of the country from which I come.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. KING. My understanding is that the Tariff Commission made an investigation and found no justification whatever for an increase in the tariff upon lumber. Is my information correct?

Mr. JONES. The Senator's information is correct, but let me say that that report was made last fall.

Mr. KING. Oh, a few weeks have passed.

Mr. JONES. The Senator does not think that amounts to anything, but conditions have been getting worse and they are still getting worse in that section of the country. They were bad enough at that time. I may say, however, that I do not think the Tariff Commission were justified in making the report which they did make. For instance, they found that Canadian lumber can be laid down in the city of New York for more than $3 a thousand less than our lumber mills can lay it down there. That in itself makes a very great difference.

Mr. KING. May I interrupt the Senator further?

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield first to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Our Republican friends—and I say it in the utmost kindness and not for the purpose of paying them a compliment—have indorsed the Tariff Commission and have said that if we could have a commission scientifically to investigate certain factors involved in production the zenith of perfection would be attained and that we could then have scientific tariff measures. Now, the Senator from Washington, one of the ablest men in public life, and a man whom we all love, is abandoning the fetish which he and his associates have worshiped and is admitting that the Tariff Commission and its findings are unimportant.

Mr. JONES. The Senator is not justified in making that statement, and I am quite sure he does not intend that it should be taken just the way it sounds. The Tariff Commission may make some mistakes once in a while; it is not a perfect body; but I believe in it; I think it is a good thing. I frankly said to the Senator it found as a general rule that the cost of production in Canada was substantially the same as in this country. It does find, however, that Canada can lay down lumber for about $3 a thousand cheaper in New York City than we do. That is quite an item. Our market is along toward the East and in the eastern cities, and, as I have said, the conditions are worse in our section than they were even last fall or last year. That is the condition that we want the Congress to correct. That is the condition that we want the Senate to try to do something to help us to meet and better just a little bit if it possibly can.

I am not going to argue with the Senator about the merits of the Tariff Commission. I myself believe in that body; I believe very much in it as it is now constituted.

Mr. KING. Theoretically.

Mr. JONES. No; I think that practically it is about all right.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. KING. By way of levity, may I say that while the Senator denies infallibility to the Tariff Commission, he certainly gives infallibility to the President of the United States.

Mr. JONES. No.

Mr. KING. And the President has approved the findings of the Tariff Commission by not changing them.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no, Mr. President. I do not even give infallibility to the President of the United States; I do not care to bring the President of the United States into this matter. Of course he has approved the report of the Tariff Commission, but probably he has not given it the study and consideration that the Senator and I would give to a matter of that kind, because we have much more time, perhaps, than has the President.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. I do not like to intrude upon the remarks of the Senator from Washington, but I should like, in my humble way, to assist him in relieving the distress of mind from which the Senator from Utah obviously is suffering. It is my understanding that, although the report of the Tariff Commission was finished comparatively recently, the inquiry was made as of the year 1929. In that year the consumptive requirements for all lumber in this country were over 34,000,000,000 feet. In the last year the consumptive requirements were something like 12,000,000,000 feet, a loss in consumption of nearly two-thirds of the entire amount. For the present year the prospect is for a still more limited market. Besides that, a great differential has been created between the currencies of the two countries since the year in which the investigation was made by the Tariff Commission. That differential of 10 per cent applies not only upon the original sales price but upon the delivered price, and includes the cost of carriage, so that there are added to the differential which the Tariff Commission actually found in favor of the Canadian manufacturer, and which, as the Senator from Washington said, is something like $3 a thousand feet laid down in New York, these new differentials which create an actual difference in the cost of production of something like five or six dollars per thousand.

So, Mr. President, it is no reflection upon the Tariff Commission, nor does it imply that anyone is criticizing the Tariff Commission if to-day we contend for something against which the Tariff Commission found in the year 1929. I have no doubt at all that if the Tariff Commission would investigate anew this question they would find the differences in the cost of production abroad as I am stating them here.

However, there is one consideration which seems to be utterly lost sight of, and that is that the Tariff Commission, as the Senator knows, can not remove an article from the free list to the dutiable list. Substantially one-half of all the lumber that is brought in is now on the free list, and as to that lumber there is not any hope in the world of the American producer getting any relief through the Tariff Commission. The only relief they can secure is the relief proposed by this bill in this Congress.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. JONES. I am ready to yield the floor.

Mr. TYDINGS. I desire to ask a question, merely for information. The Senator knows more about the lumber situation than I do. I have had no opportunity to study it. I should like to ask him what amount of revenue does he think the proposed tariff duty on lumber will yield?

Mr. JONES. The Treasury Department reported they thought it would yield $1,000,000.

Mr. TYDINGS. Would it constitute a complete embargo against foreign importations?

Mr. JONES. I do not think so.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator think that about as much lumber as now comes in would come in if the tariff duty were imposed, except that it would have to pay the tax?

Mr. JONES. I would not be surprised if substantially as much would come from Canada as heretofore, although, as I have said, I should like to see much of the foreign importations eliminated so as to encourage development in this country.

Mr. TYDINGS. I appreciate the Senator's frankness; he is always frank; but what occurred to me is that, of course, if lumber does not come in, we will not get revenue; and if lumber does not come in, our men will not get the jobs in connection with lumbering, so that we have either got to give up revenue or work; and I was wondering which or what portion of each we would lose.

Mr. JONES. I tried to make it plain a while ago that that is what might happen. I do not know for sure what will happen, but if lumber does come in we will have that much more revenue, and if it does not come in, then our people will be encouraged that much more. I am not sure which will happen.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, if it does not come in we will not have the revenue.

Mr. JONES. No; if it does not come in, we will not get the revenue; but if the market demands more lumber, our people then will furnish it and our labor will get the benefit of it. That is what I hope will happen.

Mr. TYDINGS. I appreciate that, and what I hoped was that, simply for my own information, I could elicit on the floor from someone who has made some study of the question, whether or not we were more likely to get the revenue or were more likely to get the work which would be available to American workmen if lumber were not imported.

Mr. JONES. I am willing to confess to the Senator that I hope we will get the work.

Mr. TYDINGS. And get no revenue?

Mr. JONES. And get no revenue.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is an honest man in a body that sometimes is not quite as candid as is he.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have said all I care to say. What ought to be said has, I think, already been said here, and so I yield the floor.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before the Senator from Washington sits down, I should like to ask him a question for information. Has the Senator the figures showing the consumption of lumber in 1929, 1930, and 1931? I understood that the consumption in 1929 was something like 30,000,000,000 feet, was it not?

Mr. JONES. The Senator from Utah read those figures, and I have no doubt they are correct. I do not know what year it was, whether it was 1929 when everybody was prosperous and things were going rapidly, or not.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon a question. I understood him to say a few moments ago, when he was making a statement in the time of the Senator from Washington, that there was a decrease in the consumption of lumber in 1930 and 1931 as compared to 1929. Will the Senator repeat the figures as to the consumption of lumber in this country?

Mr. STEIWER. For the year 1929 the figure was something like 34,000,000,000 feet. I think I did not state the figure for 1930, but in 1931 the figures supplied to me showed a consumption of something like 12,000,000,000 feet.

Mr. SMITH. That is lumber consumed in this country?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. To what does the Senator attribute the falling off?

Mr. STEIWER. The Senator is asking a very difficult question.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator was talking about free lumber coming in. It seems as if the freer a commodity is and the cheaper it is, the more would be consumed; but it appears that in the case of lumber the consumption has dropped off more than a half. So instead of there being 34,000,000,000 feet, as in 1929, there were only about 12,000,000,000 feet consumed in 1931. The only thing that I could attribute that to would be the poverty of the building industry, their inability to get money wherewith to build, and the inability of the people who wanted houses to pay for them. Now, in order to aid that situation it is proposed to add about $3 a thousand more on them so as to encourage the use of lumber. The higher the price is put the more the people, poverty stricken as they are, are expected to use. Where is it proposed to sell the stuff? If, when it is free and cheap, the consumption drops off two-thirds, what does the Senator expect it to do when the price is raised?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to refer to that statement. This $3 is not put upon a foot of lumber that is produced in this country. This $3 is put upon the thousand feet that is imported into this country.

Mr. SMITH. Exactly.

Mr. JONES. If it is not imported, it is not put on anything.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir; and if the people can not get that lumber they will have to buy yours and pay $3 more for it.

Mr. JONES. No; they will not. There is where the Senator is wrong about it.

Mr. SMITH. Then they will not buy any lumber at all.

Mr. JONES. Yes; they will buy lumber.

Mr. SMITH. What sort?

Mr. JONES. There is competition among those people, and they will sell their lumber at just what the market will give them. There is competition, you know, in this country. The lumber is not all sold or handled by one firm out in our country.

Mr. SMITH. I understand that.

Mr. JONES. I do not know how it is in the Senator's country.

Here is the only answer I have: This $3 is put on foreign lumber.

Mr. SMITH. I know it is.

Mr. JONES. The man who buys domestic lumber does not pay a cent of it.

Mr. SMITH. I know he does not; but the Senator will have to excuse me. The people are buying foreign lumber because they can get it cheap, and they put your people out of commission. Now, you want to put a duty on that foreign lumber and stop its importation, and force them to buy yours. Of course not a dollar of this money would be spent with the foreigner, for, by George, he could not get his lumber in here, but it would be spent with you.

Mr. JONES. Apparently there is no use in our spending any time in arguing that, because, in my judgment, the purchaser would not pay a cent of that $3 to me unless I had a monopoly of the domestic lumber and there was a great demand for it. I would not get a cent of that $3 in that instance. If the Senator can not see it any other way, however, and thinks that because Congress authorizes a tax of $3 a thousand on foreign lumber the domestic producer will put $3 on his product, I can not convince him to the contrary. I know to the contrary, but the Senator has not the same knowledge that I have. He does not look at things in the way that I do.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will my colleague yield for a suggestion?

Mr. JONES. Yes; I am through.

Mr. DILL. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that since 1929 the average price of lumber has decreased from $20.63 per thousand to $13 per thousand, and it is still going lower; and the oversupply of lumber now on hand is so great that there is not a possibility within the next year, at least, and probably two years, of this import tariff affecting the domestic lumber.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; Mr. President; and the price of everything else has gone down. The price of cotton has gone from 30 cents to 5 cents, the price of wheat has gone from $2 a bushel to 25 cents a bushel, and the wages of the laborers of the country who are fortunate enough to have jobs have been cut half in two and the balance of them turned out in the blotting-paper crowd. If we are going to bolster up these industries, in the name of the God of Justice let us give back these people their jobs and give them full wages. If we are to come here and bolster up lumber, bolster up oil, and bolster up copper, in the name of the God of Justice let us bolster up the jobs and the wages of the laboring people.

This is a country for us all. It is not right for us to stand here and pick out some favored classes and legislate for them and leave the mass of the American people helpless and bankrupt.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from South Carolina is in only the first phase of this matter, may I say, because I want to point out to him that first of all we are going, as he says, to increase the price of lumber, but later on in the session we have a bill coming in here known as the home bill, to take care of the home. Then we are going to do the usual thing. We are going into the Federal Treasury to get the money to lend to the man who wants to build a home upon whose materials we have already increased the price by this tariff.

Mr. SMITH. And we are going to have the money we provide paid to the man who is the beneficiary of the tariff, namely, the man who furnishes the lumber.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is right. It comes right back where it started.

Mr. SMITH. My mentality is such that I can not grasp these great, big problems that with just a turn of mind can make black white and make white black. I can not do that. I can not see how we can add to the price of a thing and not add to the price. I am unable to see how we can add $3 a thousand to lumber and not increase the price of lumber. I utterly fail to see that.

Mr. President, this paradox that confronts me in my limited mental processes seems to have confronted us all. Here we are in the midst of the greatest distress that America has ever seen. Those who just a few months ago were rich are now poor and those who were then poor are now paupers. The leveling process of this deadly thing has brought about a condition that has bankrupted the States.

They can not meet their obligations. It has even threatened the Federal Government, we are told. In the midst of this universal poverty, we come here with a bill adding still greater burdens to those that the people already are groaning under, committing suicide under, and losing their homes under. We come here with a tax bill of a billion dollars that reaches into every home and adds a Federal tax to every commodity in the country, for we need not deceive ourselves. When we impose a tax, be it an income tax or any other, it will, under the natural law of gravitation, settle upon the man on the ground.

Here we are in the midst of this distress. Instead of finding a means of starting the wonderful wealth of this country to moving, instead of breaking the crust and letting commodities begin to move, we are here spending our time and our energy in attempting to bring about the restoration of prosperity through the imposition of tariffs at the top of the list; and what has happened with the two-billion-dollar Reconstruction Finance Corporation? From the day of the enactment of that law until now the market has either been stagnant, static, or has gradually declined.

The mass of the people have no voice here. I have sat here and listened to this plea for oil; I have listened to this plea for coal; I have listened to this plea for lumber; I have listened to pleas to increase the price of these few representatives of the great, diversified industries of this country; but I have not heard one word as to what we are going to do to increase the consuming capacity of the masses of the people. When we begin to talk about extending aid to those who are in dire need of it we are met with the expression, "They have had too much credit already."

It reminds me of what Pat said to Mike when Mike was riding an old horse so poor that every time he took a step he reeled. Pat said, "Mike, why in the name of God, don't you put more flesh on that horse's bones?" Mike replied, "Hell! He can hardly walk with what he has got. What would he do with any more?" [Laughter.] That seems to be the philosophy of our legislatures in reference to the masses of the people.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator has very ably pointed out the burden which these tariff duties would impose upon the masses of the people at this particular time. I desire to call his attention to the fact that this duty on lumber of $3 per 1,000 feet is the same upon the lumber that the poor buy at $12, $15, and $20 per thousand as it is upon lumber that costs $150 and $200 and $250 per thousand feet, used as mahogany paneling in the homes and in the offices of the well-to-do. In other words, in addition to the serious general burden upon the poor that all tariff duties are, this tariff levies an ad valorem duty of 33⅓ per cent upon the lumber of the farmer and the poor home owner, and a duty of only 1 per cent upon the lumber of the well-to-do.

Mr. SMITH. I thank the Senator, and, Mr. President, while I am on this point, there is another contradiction in terms.

We have an organization for the conservation of natural resources. One of the main things I have heard discussed on this floor, and have heard the changes rung upon it, is the preservation of our forests, the reforestation of our depleted watersheds, the rapid disappearance of our standing timber. When other countries say, "All right; just rest a while from the destruction of your forests and we will furnish you all the lumber you need cheaper than you can furnish it yourselves," with one breath we vote to spend money to save our forests and with the next breath we vote to levy a duty to keep other people from helping us do it.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. There was a time in this country when the rate of cut was greater than the rate of growth, but under present conditions the rate of consumption is so curtailed that all the authorities agree that we are producing lumber faster than we are using it. So the old conservation argument that was made 25 years ago no longer has the force that it formerly had.

At the time that we were destroying our timber stands faster than they were growing the conservation argument was a valid and proper argument to be used, but I submit to the Senator that now, when all of the authorities say that the reproduction is considerably in excess of what we can cut and use, the conservation argument is no longer what it used to be.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I can speak from experience, and more or less authoritatively, about my section of the country. In the old days there was no timber in the world known to the timber people which could compete with the yellow pine of the South. It was so rich in turpentine that it preserved itself. Stumps in some of the fields in my section of the country were there during the Revolutionary War. They are practically indestructible. That forest is gone now forever. We have a quick growth, comparatively, known as the old field or slash pine, but it takes from 15 to 20 years for it to reach anything like milling condition, and when it does reach it, it is a very inferior kind of lumber. So that I know that in my section the available lumber trees have gone, and another generation will pass before we will have anything like lumber again.

Be that as it may, I say that the American people, home builders and home lovers, are entitled to get the lumber to build their homes wherever they can get it the cheapest. You have no right to subject the home builder to the necessity of having to pay an additional price for his home for the benefit of another American citizen, without granting that home builder some means of getting the extra price to pay for it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LONG. On the theory of a home owner having the right to build his home at the very best price, what would be the Senator's objection to letting Chinese labor come in without immigration restriction to build the houses for these people?

Mr. SMITH. Somehow or other I think there is a difference between a man and a house; though sometimes I doubt it. What I mean to say is that when it comes to the question of the American people being protected unless we can protect them all; we have no right to protect a few at the expense of all.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say something about this bill. I think it is a shame that this bill has been brought into the Senate to balance the Federal Budget before we have aided the people to balance their budgets, as the Senator from Idaho said the other day. There is not a State in the Union which could to-day take the income it has and meet the outgo. Or, if there are such States, there are very few of them. The teachers of the youth of the land throughout the several States are deprived of their salaries. Teachers of the city of Chicago can not collect their salaries, due to shortage in the municipal income of that city. Teachers in my State are asking that the certificates from the State shall be made eligible for discount at the member banks of the Federal reserve system, so that with an amendment to the act the Reconstruction Finance Corporation can benefit those people who have devoted their lives to teaching. Throughout the country we find bankruptcy, mortgages, and debt, and we are here to-night, as the result of the maladministration of our affairs, adding a billion dollars to the already overburdened and distressed American people.

The Senator from Oklahoma, speaking here to-day, said the doctrine of Jefferson was that when you were hit you should hit back. The other nations of the earth followed Thomas Jefferson, and when we erected that crime known as the Smoot-Hawley law they hit back, every nation on earth hit back. They said, "You have all the gold; we can not buy without gold. You demand that we shall pay you in gold; we have not the gold, but we will pay you in kind." We said, "No; you shall not dump on us, either." We had all the gold, and erected tariff barriers; and here we are drowning in our own fat.

The whole trouble began when we erected a tariff wall against the outside world, which had been depopulated and financially ruined, not because of any selfishness on our part but because we had been favored with almost illimitable resources, and to the beleaguered nations of the earth we extended credit and succor during the time of the war. Thank God, we furnished the men and the means that brought a happy ending to the miserable world conflict. We extend them aid and sent them men; and then, when pay day came, we found ourselves in possession of a major part of the monetary gold of the world.

The nations asked to trade with us. They had no other means of reviving their industry; they had no other means of even paying us in part. We said, "We will not become a dumping ground." Therefore we erected that monstrous thing known as the Smoot-Hawley bill; we shut the door to the nations of the world and kept out gold, but demanded that they pay us in gold. They did not have the gold with which to pay us, and we refused to accept their exchange in kind. So we have arrived to-night at the logical consequence of this miserable thing known as a high protective tariff. It is the logical result.

Thank God, I have one thing to my credit, if nothing else. I voted against every schedule in that miserable thing and then voted against the whole bill. I had the unique distinction of being the one genuine, simon-pure, unreconstructed and unterrified Democrat in this building. [Laughter.] Thank God, the result has justified my position.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want to answer the Senator, but his statement is very easily answered.

Mr. SMITH. I know it is.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to get this bill passed; and if it is going to do any good, let it come just as quickly as possible.

Mr. SMITH. You started in in a poor way to do good. Here you are going to add to the iniquity you have already perpetrated. [Laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. SMOOT. The "iniquity" I have already perpetrated is the Senator's opinion.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The Chair desires to admonish the galleries that the rules of the Senate forbid demonstrations. The Chair will ask the occupants of the galleries to please respect the rule.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I would be lenient with the audience. God knows they have very few things to divert them in these days of Republican rule; and if in this performance they can get anything to divert them from the horrors they have at home, let them laugh. I do not object at all.

Mr. President, I do not feel, honestly I do not feel, like bringing a railing accusation against my colleagues on this side. It is not a very pleasant duty. But those over on the other side are so clever, and their association has been so intimate, that they have horribly corrupted some on my side. That is what is the matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, there is no use going over the same thing. A false principle wrought into real law will work itself out in disaster, and for 60 long years and more an intensive form of high protection has been the order of the day, with just minor checks given by two Democratic administrations. Here in 1932, with more textiles than we know what to do with, with more wheat than we know what to do with, with more meat than we know what to do with, with more building material and more facilities for fabricating homes and the comforts of home than we know what to do with, 10,000,000 people are barefooted, hungry, and naked, and those who are not that low, stand terror stricken, knowing not what to-morrow may bring forth an indictment of the intelligence of those of us who presume to fashion the law under which these trusting individuals live.

Tantalus standing chin deep in water and finding it impossible to get a drop to drink.

Wheat rotting in the bins and men starving on the streets.

Meat actually piling up in our abattoirs and men hungry. Tatters and rags, the Red Cross hunting old clothes to dole out to an American citizen, and wool and cotton can not find a market.

We certainly are an intelligent bunch. [Laughter.]

In former years we might have said this condition arises because we are more or less dependent upon foreign markets, and can not hear for a good long time from those markets. The facilities for transportation and communication are so perfect now that China is nearer to this Chamber than the White House was 50 years ago. We are one great big family, encircling the globe with our radios and our telegraph, carrying our mail and our light merchandise through the air and in palatial merchant vessels, making us one great community, a democracy of the universe. Yet, with a stupid adherence to an effete financial system, we allow the peoples of the earth to be poverty stricken and beggared because we have not the courage to face the issue and find the solution.

Here to-night and this afternoon, invoking an old policy that has bankrupted America; here to-night, on a little handful of coal that slips into the city of Boston, you penalize every shivering individual who seeks to warm himself in the bitterness of winter, in order to protect a coal monopoly. You are sending the poor, shivering individual who has been made homeless by this stupid attitude of our lawmakers out on the street to wander about because he can not pay the additional $3 a thousand on lumber. You will take the cotton and wheat growers of the West and the South and add a half a billion dollars annually on their backs to meet the modern method of motive force and power in the form of the internal-combustion engine, because some man bores a hole in the ground and taps that which God manufactured for us. You will penalize every man who ought to be the beneficiary of this providence of God that is placed in the bowels of the earth against our need and the development of our genius.

You are penalizing every man who adapts himself and uses this motive force, and you lay upon the impoverished farmers of this country a half billion dollars in order to enrich a few so-called independents.

Mr. President, in the name of the American people, who is going to pay these bills? Stripped now, what is the use of making a plea to the people? They do not pay anything in at election time. Trace this infamous proceeding back and it will be found to wind up where the contributions came from to carry an election. We are not fooling anybody. Perhaps it is enough for me to wind up what I have to say in the wonderful words of that marvelous genius where he said:

> Through tatter'd clothes small vices do appear;
> Robes and furr'd gowns hide all. Plate sin with gold,
> And the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks;
> Arm it in rags, a pygmy's straw does pierce it.

Oh, Mr. President, that is the theory and that is the philosophy which is governing us all. Cumulative to that, Woodsworth put into the mouth of Bob Roy the slogan of all time:

> The good old rule
> Sufficeth them, the simple plan,
> That they should take who have the power
> And they should keep, who can.

Under modern conditions that doctrine will bring warfare, rioting and bloodshed, and God knows how far we are from it in this country at this time. Just how much further can we go without opening the doors of opportunity to these millions who are sitting in these galleries and outside filled with a nameless fear? Just so sure as there is a God above us, the people of this country are losing confidence in their government, both local and national, and God help us when that confidence is entirely gone.

I have sat here day after day. I have not been so discouraged in all my life as I have been in the consideration of this tax bill. It was enough, God knows, that you and I were called upon to add one jot or tittle to the suffering of the masses of the people. It seemed to be necessary that we must get some revenue direct and not in the form of bonds to meet the expenditures of the Government. But when there was injected into it the opportunist, who saw some kind of an excuse to slip in the greedy hand of a protective tariff for the benefit of a few at the expense of the many, I gave up.

Mr. President, I do not believe that democracy has ceased to exist—the grand old doctrine of equal rights to all and special privileges to none. Have we heard the cry of special privilege in this the hour of the Nation's travail? I would have felt sad enough and disappointed enough if I had heard it from those whose immemorial doctrine was "fleece the masses for the benefit of the classes." But when that doctrine found a foothold on my side of the Chamber in this hour it was almost more than I could bear. It was bad enough when we were discussing a pure tariff bill, but when, in the sad task of taxing an impoverished people, we are asked for a rake-off for certain monopolies and corporations, it was going too far. I will join any Senator in doing what the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said we should do: Let us balance the people's Budget and thank God they will balance ours; but if we unbalance theirs, as we have done, they will unbalance ours.

Mr. President, I am afraid to go on any further. I really am. I want to get back to the old doctrine. It is the only thing that will ultimately save the country, and that is that no matter how expedient it may seem; no matter how plausible it may seem; no matter how one's promotion and election may hang on it, he has no right to tax all the people for the benefit of a special privileged class. He can not justify it, I do not care how good the principle may be.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. No; I will not yield now. I expect to yield the floor in a moment.

It does not make any difference how good the principle may be, I state this as a fact, that no matter how theoretically and abstractly perfect a principle may be, if the only policy that you can adapt to it impoverishes some and enriches others, you have no right to put it into operation.

Mr. President, I can not understand the viewpoint of those who are willing in this hour to impose even the burdens of this tax bill on the American people. I have been in the Senate 23 years. I never heard before about balancing a Budget. Sometimes I think it is a camouflage to hide something else, but I shall not dwell on that. If we can issue $2,000,000,000 of bonds to underwrite the papers of certain industries that seem to be in jeopardy, why could we not issue $2,000,000,000 of bonds to meet our obligations and amortize them over a period of years and not impose this burden on the American people in this way? I do not feel like voting for a single thing in this bill, not a single thing. Taxing the American people who are coming to us and pleading with empty hands and breaking hearts for relief, we answer them with this stone. Asking us for bread, we give them $1,000,000,000 in taxes. Asking us for a home, we charge them $3 extra on the lumber. Asking for the power to move themselves, we place an extra tax upon their oil and gasoline. They say, "We are cold and want warmth." We say, "All right; go and pay a tribute to anthracite and bituminous coal companies, and then get warm if you have the wherewith to get the coal."

So far as copper is concerned——

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, why not give the people 2.75 per cent beer and let them have what they want? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. The Senator knows he would not be so unkind as to fill an empty stomach with alcohol. It would make them sick. He should fill the stomach with food and then let them take the beer.

Mr. BROUSSARD. But it is medicine, recognized under the Volstead law. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. Oh, yes; but they have too much medicine now. [Laughter.]

No, Mr. President; unless I change my mind I do not think I shall vote for a single thing as to excise taxes in this bill. It may sound to the wiseacres like a radical statement, but they may hear a different sound before the snow flies. When you begin to add to the burdens of an already nervous and restless people, the breaking point may come somewhere. I would join with my colleagues to go to any length to try to relieve the situation of the masses. Let us start at the ground.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Why not permit them to drink 2.75 per cent beer? If they had that we could get enough revenue from that source to pay all of the bills.

Mr. SMITH. Why, my dear Senator, I would be tickled to death if I could just get the American people's pockets full of money and their stomachs full of food, and then we would discuss the Senator's beer proposition.

Mr. BROUSSARD. But we need the money now.

Mr. SMITH. So far as that is concerned, I do not want to——

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. Not now. I positively saw the Senate the other day get intoxicated just talking about beer, and I do not want to discuss it to-night. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I have expressed myself as a Democrat, and I leave this question, of course, to the consciences of those who have to meet the issue.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hope we may now consider the bill. I again call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the fact that every day that we delay consideration of the bill is costing the Treasury of the United States over $2,000,000.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I invited the attention last night of the Senator in charge of the bill to the danger into which we were running. I invited the attention of the country to the fact that the majority party had it in its power, when the bill was in the Finance Committee, to eliminate these tariff items. I went so far as to suggest at least that the President of the United States might still rescue this measure from almost inevitable disaster. Notwithstanding that fact, Mr. President, the Senate has proceeded to confirm the duties upon two products imposed in this bill, when under no protective theory yet evolved can one of those duties be justified, and the other is involved in extreme doubt.

I have long thought that in this time of crisis no man charged with public responsibility can afford to indulge in idle language or meaningless generalities; and I now recur to the oft-repeated statement made during the debate on the oil amendment, namely, that there were four arguments against the oil tariff—the Standard Oil of New Jersey, the Standard Oil of Indiana, as I recall, the Dutch Shell, and the Gulf Oil Co. I now say that there are four arguments for the oil, coal, copper, and lumber tariffs, and I enumerate them: They are oil, coal, copper, and lumber. They are the arguments.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. No; I do not yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia declines to yield.

Mr. GEORGE. They are the arguments. Now, those in charge of the bill urge the Senate to make speed with the bill which they have deliberately wrecked, which, with full warning and knowledge, they have run into a condition from which it may be difficult to extricate it.

What course is open to those of us who have insisted, wholly without regard to the merits or the demerits of these particular tariff items, that they be not retained in this bill? As for myself, the course lies straight ahead of me. It is to vote for the 1918 income-tax rates and against every excise tax in the bill. If Senators want tariffs, they have the choice of taking them in an hour like this, when the credit of the Nation is at stake, or saying that no industry such as that of oil, with its shadowy history, with its slimy course running through the Harding administration, shall put its strong hand at the throats of the American people until special grants have been made to oil producers and coal producers and now lumber producers and to-morrow copper producers.

If these industries have a case, let them present it when a tariff bill is before the Congress, and we may properly consider tariffs; let them submit the case when all customs duties may be properly weighed and evaluated; but for the majority party, speaking through the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee, now to warn us that every moment is precious and that we ought to make speed with this tax bill, makes it necessary, Mr. President, for me to say what I have said on this occasion; and I now again say, my friends on the other side of the aisle may pass the bill with tariffs in if they will, but so far as I am concerned they must take their choice between the bill without tariffs or the 1918 rates.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I merely want to ask the Senator if he does not think that probably the motive prompting all this haste is to enact this law with these special provisions in it so that the private interests may begin to take from the public perhaps two or three or four million dollars a day to support their industries?

Mr. GEORGE. I have finished what I have to say.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, it might be in order——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield for a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] has referred upon two or three occasions to the fact that the Republican Party is responsible for initiating the tariff items in this revenue bill. The House of Representatives is controlled by the Democratic Party; this bill came from the House of Representatives, and that body entered the tariff field and sent over to the Senate a duty upon crude petroleum, and also sent here a provision in the pending bill levying a tax upon coal and coke. It was not the Republican Senate that initiated tariff items in the bill—not at all—but, so far as I am personally concerned, after the field was entered and the items were voted into the bill in the Finance Committee, not by one party in that committee but by a majority consisting of Senators of both parties, if we are going to retain two tariff items in the bill, I see no reason why the other items should not be included, because the industries producing the commodities affected are exactly in the same unfortunate condition as the other two upon which the House acted.

AN UPLIFTED DEMOCRACY

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana has the floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not want to yield further to the Senator from Utah, if I may help it, at this time, if he will permit me.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; I merely wanted to say what I have said; and I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. LONG. I just have something I want to read, and then I will turn the floor over to the Senator, if he desires.

Mr. President, I want to say that I have listened to the eloquence of the Senator from Georgia; I am one of those who have listened to every word he has said in this debate; but I have a responsibility to the Democratic Party, and I do not want the Senator from Georgia to take away the credit that is due the Democratic Party because of this bill. We deny, as Democrats—and coming, as I do, from the leading Democratic State of this Union, as proved by the last presidential vote—I deny that the Republican Party is due any credit at all, if we can help giving them any credit, for these tariff items.

Furthermore, we call the attention of the public to the fact that in the 1928 platform of the Democratic Party we went on record for the kind of protection—and a great deal better protection—that is afforded by this bill.

Furthermore, if there is anybody who is going to lecture Democrats because Democrats vote for tariff items, there is nobody whose shining example is better than that of the Senator from Georgia. I have his tariff record; and it is one of the things that we intend to present in the coming campaign to the intelligently equipped voters of this country who want to vote for a tariff that protects their people. We are going to submit the record of the Senator from Georgia in my State to prove that the Democratic Party does stand for protection at least on everything that is raised in Georgia. [Laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate must be in order.

The present occupant of the chair will announce that unless occupants of the galleries maintain order the galleries will be cleared. The Senator from Louisiana will proceed.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, here is the record of the Senator from Georgia on the tariff. I want to take occasion to read it, because he has been designated, I am sure, by a number as a disciplinarian of the Democrats and the Republicans for the stand they are taking here on this bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am speaking for myself, and for myself alone.

Mr. LONG. I assume that to be so, Senator, but I mean there are many here who, at least, take comfort in what the Senator says.

On October 4, 1929, the Senator from Georgia voted for Mr. BLAINE'S amendment for a 5½-cent rate of duty on casein. The House rate was 2½ cents; the Senate Finance Committee rate was 3½ cents, but the Senator voted to raise it to 5½ cents.

On November 5, 1929, the Senator from Georgia voted for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] to restore the duty on silica, crude and suitable for pigments.

On January 28, 1930, the Senator from Georgia voted for the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS] to increase the duty on vegetable oils. That was a righteous vote. Why? Because we produce cotton in the South, in Louisiana, and in Georgia, and the Senator from Georgia, like myself, wants the oil industry of the cotton-growing States protected; but when he gets to the oil that Georgia does not produce it is a terrible thing, it is a horrible affair, to tax 120,000,000 people for the oil that others produce, but it is all right to protect the oil that is squeezed out of the cottonseed that comes from the State of Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, of course I will follow the Senator, but I want to suggest to him now that when I came here in response to the President's special message asking the Congress to equalize the condition of agriculture with industry by giving to agriculture suitable tariff rates, I voted for all such rates that I thought were reasonable.

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; and I think the Senator voted right in every vote he cast for the tariff. I disagree with the Senator in voting against tariff rates on commodities in which his State is not interested but with which I am concerned in Louisiana. I am going to vote for all the tariff items the Senator has voted for, and I will vote to increase some of them.

I simply do not think that he should make fish out of one and fowl out of the other, and I do not want him to do the harm that he is now doing, because the record of the Senator from Georgia reflects credit upon the Democratic Party. Because he has stood here to protect the people of the United States from slave labor and slave trade, I would not now want him to go so far afield as to discredit the Democratic Party and lodge in the Republican Party the credit for the magnificent protective record which he has and of which his party is going to know when the fall campaign comes on. As I have said, I myself intend in my State to publish the record of the Senator from Georgia, so that the people of Louisiana may know that they can safely rely upon the Democratic Party as a protective party in this country. I think the Senator from Georgia is right.

If the Senator from Utah wants to dispute that the Republican Party is due the credit for protection, if he wants to admit that at last the old Republican Party is not anything but a free-trade party anyway, I will admit it myself, because the people of the United States do not favor leaving this country unprotected.

I want to read a little further from this record.

On February 18, 1930, the Senator from Georgia voted for Mr. CONNALLY'S amendment to increase the duty on cattle. That was a proper vote, and I would have voted that way. I will vote to increase it again.

On February 19, 1930, the Senator from Georgia voted for Mr. HAYDEN'S amendment to increase the duty on dates in packages.

On March 3, 1930, he voted for Mr. SHORTRIDGE'S amendment for a duty on long-staple cotton.

Mr. President—and I am sorry the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has left the Chamber—we have been told all the time that the Southern States needed no tariff, because cotton was strictly an exportable crop. But the time has come, Mr. President, when in Turkey and in Egypt and in Russia and in India they are raising plenty of cotton, and not only is it going to be necessary for long-staple cotton to have a tariff, but the time is not far distant when there is going to be a tariff on all cotton.

I see my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will lay off the Senator from Mississippi, because the Senator from Mississippi will be liable to respond. Just leave out my tariff record. I have not spoken on oil yet, nor on copper, nor on lumber; but I can if I am invited. I can speak on it at length.

Mr. LONG. The reason I am mentioning the Senator from Mississippi is strictly a compliment.

Mr. HARRISON. It may be a compliment in the Senator's opinion, but it may not be in my opinion.

Mr. LONG. I am sorry the Senator thinks that his record would be anything but complimentary to himself. I do not believe the Senator from Mississippi would disown his own record; and I believe the Senator will agree with me that his record on the tariff and on all other public matters reflects great credit on the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I agree to that, and I am glad the Senator agrees with me in one thing and wants to applaud one effort that I have made. I am just saying to the Senator, however, that I am not in this controversy, and it will afford me much pleasure if he will leave my name out of it. He is proceeding on the Senator from Georgia; so let him go after the Senator from Georgia but not after me, because I shall feel obliged to respond, and I do not want to respond. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. The Senator knows that we have followed the Democracy of the Senator from Mississippi before the Senator from Georgia ever came to this body.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and as long as the Senator followed me he was right on Democracy.

Mr. LONG. All right. Well, then, the Senator from Mississippi was persuaded to vote for a tariff of 7 cents a pound on long-staple cotton. Mississippi probably produces more long-staple cotton than any other State in the Union.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I make a bid for apology to the Senator from Louisiana for what I have to say. I beg him not to believe that I rise out of any attitude of attempted censoriousness; and I hope that the handsome, vital, and vivid young Senator from Louisiana will believe me when I say that I doubt if we promote our cause by exploring the records of our brethren.

There is no man in the Senate who has been here any considerable time who can say, "There is the white light of consistency, and I have followed it without a shadow of turning." If he can truly say such, then he has done nothing in the Senate.

We appreciate the efforts, the vitality, and the vigor of the Senator from Louisiana. I do not agree with the Senator from Mississippi on these items. I do not agree on these items with the Senator from Georgia. I listened enraptured to the speech of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I do not agree with him on these items, but he charmed me. I am certain that every vote these three Senators and others, all of them, have cast has been the result of an honest mental operation, guided by a clear conscience.

I again ask the Senator from Louisiana to believe that I rise not out of any attempted censoriousness. I am anxious to have a vote on these items, lumber and copper, to-night, if possible. We ought to vote; and, not trying to be facetious, I like to listen to the Senator from Louisiana. What he says is fresh and it is breezy [laughter]; but I ask him to withhold any further discussion at this time, because I see clearly that we are going to plunge into a long and bitter discussion which will consume not only this evening but possibly all of to-morrow.

If the Senator will allow me, I will ask that we vote now on these items.

Mr. LONG. I am ready to vote.

Mr. GEORGE. No, Mr. President; when the Senator is ready to yield I shall be glad to take the floor.

Mr. LONG. All right. I am ready to vote, Mr. President. I have been ready to vote on this lumber question for some time. We have already voted on two other items after two days of discussion, and I thought we were going to vote on this third item; but after several hours were taken up in oratory I considered that I ought not to let my party be stabbed without rising to its defense.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me appeal to the Senator not to say anything further on the subject now. I should like very much to get a vote upon this matter.

Mr. LONG. I should, too. I shall be through in just a minute; but we have more oratory coming. As the Senator from Arizona has suggested, I could see that that spirit of oratory had reached uncontrollable limits by the time I came to the Senate about the fourth time for a vote; and I concluded that some reply should be made to the charge that irreparable harm is going to be done to the masses of this country, which they think is Democratic doctrine. I do not think it is.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; for a question.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to state that there will not be a vote within three minutes after the Senator yields the floor. I have an amendment to the paragraph in regard to lumber. I have had no opportunity whatever to say a word about it, and I am going to have an opportunity to say something about it. Do not yield the floor thinking that you are going to get a vote in three minutes.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator from Florida is going to say something, we know that he usually does say something that we will all want to listen to; and I thank him for his contribution.

However, Mr. President, I am not going to take time to read all the record of any one of the Senators. There are several more lines to be read upon the votes of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. I think the Senator from Georgia knows—whether he does or not, I can assure him that it is a fact—that there is nobody in this body or in his native and beloved State who regards the motives and the integrity of the Senator more highly than I do myself. No one believes more firmly than I that he has been guided not only by a good conscience but by a proper judgment in all of his tariff votes.

On March 13, 1930, he voted for concurrence in the amendment for a duty on long-staple cotton.

On March 14, 1913, he voted for reconsideration of the vote adopting the amendment reducing the rates on wrapper tobacco; and the Senator made a speech on the subject. This is something that I am glad is in the RECORD, because it will be possible for us to send out this speech as a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD free of cost, showing how the Democratic Party stands. As one of the members of the party, I intend to avail myself of the franking privilege to send this speech through the mails, free of cost, to show that the United States is represented in this body by good, sound, protection Democrats.

The Senator from Georgia said this. I read from page 5699 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 18, 1929:

> Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I understand the Senator's argument, and I think the Senator has very well stated the case. I would like the case to be very well understood because it is a very clear case of conflict between manufacturers and producers. It is one of the clearest illustrations in the entire tariff bill. The rate of $2.50 on unstemmed wrapper tobacco will not increase the cost of the 5-cent cigar.

Just as we told you that the rate on oil is not going to increase the price of gasoline. The fact that there was a tariff on wrapper tobacco going into the making up of cigars, the Senator very appropriately said, was not going to increase the price, but it was a good protection.

> The Senator is quite right about it. I am willing to make that statement on my own responsibility so far as it may go. A rate of $1.60, such as the Senator from New York proposes, will not reduce that price.
> So what is the situation before us? We have the plain case of whether we desire to give more profit to the manufacturer. We have a clear-cut case of whether we desire to give certain manufacturers of cigars more profit or whether we wish to give the producer a better chance to control his market.

That is the logic from the Senator from Georgia. He made a long speech to that effect; but the Senator from Georgia is not the only man in the Senate on this side of the Chamber who has a tariff record to be proud of. I take one or two at random, that they may be considered.

The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] has a good record. He voted for 19 increases and against 35 decreases.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] voted for some increases and against some decreases—not so many.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the leader of this side of the Chamber, has a fair record himself on the tariff—not as good, however, as others.

My predecessor in the Senate, Senator Ransdell, who was in Congress for 32 years from the leading Democratic State of America, had 34 votes for increases, and 44 votes against decreases.

The junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] voted in connection with the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill for nine increases and against three decreases.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] has a record that to the heart that loves liberty is more enchanting than romance. [Laughter.] He voted for 21 increases and against 23 decreases. Lemons; fruits—I do not know whether there is a tariff on alligators or not, or other products of the State of Florida. We have some of them in Louisiana. Florida products, according to the investigation, I have made of this situation, are better protected than the products of any other State in this Union under the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill which we are living under to-day, thanks to the Florida Senators.

It is just a question of whose ox is gored.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] very clearly stated the case from the floor here the other day when he, from the Republican side, was engaged in some kind of an argument with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], each charging the other's party with being responsible for the tariff bill; but, so far as I can find from the RECORD, the Senator from New Hampshire has voted to protect everything that is in New Hampshire, and the Senator from Georgia has voted to protect everything that is in Georgia. When, however, it comes to a proposition of giving protection to about 350,000 workingmen engaged in the business of making a living out of the oil industry, they both turned around here and gave to the Mexican laborer and to the Venezuelan laborer and to the Colombian laborer a differential which they would not have been willing, according to the RECORD, to have inflicted upon an industry of Georgia or of New Hampshire.

What kind of fairness is that? The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] very properly says that no Senator here can be consistent on his tariff votes. I do not know how long I shall be here, but my record will be consistent on tariff votes. After I have undertaken to get for my people a tariff on everything that we grow and produce in my State, in order that the people of Louisiana, one of the 48 States, can live and thrive and work and eat, I will never be found going into another part of the country and saying to that other State, "You are not entitled to a tariff."

Take this tariff on lumber. Some of us here have worked in sawmills and know something about them. I have worked in one a little myself. I have cut the logs that were carried to the sawmill. I have worked in the mills. I have stacked the lumber, and I know something about the business. I have graded the lumber, I have checked the lumber, and many other Senators sitting here have done the same thing.

The way the lumber industry is treated is the most unfair thing ever heard of toward an industry that you can not say is monopolized, and which has not even been charged on the floor of the Senate as being monopolized. There is no industry that is as free for competition as the lumber industry. There are thousands and hundreds of thousands of men whose families are dependent for a living upon the business of cutting timber. There are railroad men hauling the timber in cars; there are many men in the mills cutting the timber into lumber, stacking it, and doing everything connected with the lumber industry, hundreds of thousands of people. I would hesitate to say how many; and yet I was told by a friend of mine the other day that right in the town of Texarkana, a town half in Arkansas and a half in Texas—I believe the home of the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]—some foreign lumber was laid down in that town, practically the center of the sawmill country of the Southwest, for $2 a thousand cheaper than the cost of manufacturing it and selling it there on the ground.

Yet you call that a fair deal from the State of Georgia and from the State of New Hampshire, regardless of whether it is the Democratic Party or the Republican Party. You call that a fair deal, to close up the sawmills of this country, shut down the State of Arkansas, shut down the State of Louisiana, shut down the State of Washington, shut down the State of Oregon, and talk about this being a tradeout and a washout, 4 to 4, and all that. Instead of it being 4 and 4, if I had been sitting in the seat of the Senator from New Hampshire or the seat of the Senator from Georgia when they produced that tariff item in the Smoot-Hawley or any other revenue bill or tariff bill—because a tariff bill is a revenue bill—I would have been voting for the protection of the other man if I was undertaking to impose protection for my own interests.

The Senator from Georgia is a very learned attorney, and a just one. He is known throughout the South and the Southeast as being one of the most thorough lawyers in this country, and any man who knows the law as well as the Senator from Georgia knows it, knows that we impose a tariff under the taxing power, under the revenue-producing power, of the Constitution of the United States, lodged in Congress, the only ground for doing it, and practically all of the test cases that have gone to the Supreme Court of the United States are cases in which the income tax or other forms of taxes were combined with the taxes that were levied on imports coming into this country.

If there is any precedent on this matter, certainly the precedent ought to be that Congress, without any question whatever, has followed the policy of putting tariff rates into revenue bills. And you have a case here where you ought to do it.

I voted for the 1918 war-time rates on incomes. They ought to have carried, in my opinion. I will vote that the rates on inheritances be raised. I think they ought to be raised. However, if you are going to raise funds to support the Government, and undertake by this bill to do the least harm and the most good, what more could you do than to make it possible to open up the sawmills of this country? You created a subsidy, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. You have had another subsidy in the form of the moratorium. It will be better than all the subsidies if you open up the coal mines and the oil fields, if you open up the copper mines, if you open up the sawmills, and put the people in the lumber camps, and get these people back to work. That will be a great deal better than any other form of subsidy you can grant here. And you are not only adopting the right kind of a subsidy, but you will be collecting funds for the support of this Government, and starting the wheels of industry to moving again, and putting these people to doing something useful, instead of providing that you will leave the products of this country where they can not meet the competition of Soviet Russia and the slave-trade labor of Venezuela, Colombia, and other foreign countries.

The Senator from Mississippi asked me not to mention him, and I know the Senator does not mean that, because I only mention him as a matter of helping the party. I understand there is no rule of the Senate, in discussing the merits of these various provisions, against my undertaking to give certain credit to the Democratic Party, and I only undertake it at this time because it is not very long before the next political campaign, and I think the Senate, and I think the Nation, should certainly be informed upon the principal matters.

I have been fair in my discussions here in the Senate. I have stated the things the Democratic Party has done which I did not think were to the credit of the Democratic Party, and I am sure that the Senator from Mississippi is not now going to ask me to refrain from stating the things which I think do credit to the Democratic Party.

In that connection I would refer to the single instance I was going to use, of the tariff on long-staple cotton, 7 cents a pound. It ought to be 7 cents, anyway. It ought to be more than 7 cents, and there will have to be a tariff on other cotton.

The Senator from Mississippi stated on the floor of the Senate something for which I was going to take credit and pride for my State, that he is a graduate of the Louisiana State University. He is one of the great examples of great good, and great service that is being performed by the Louisiana State University. The Louisiana State University was founded by William Tecumseh Sherman. General Sherman was the president of the Louisiana State University when the war broke out between the States, and we "loaned" General Sherman to the United States during the pendency of that war; and made a rather bad swap. [Laughter.]

However, that great university was receiving a tariff—not a tariff, a tax—on oil produced in Louisiana, all the way from 3 or 4 to 11 cents a barrel, and as a result of the oil tax we have been able to extend that school, until it not only opened its arms to the Senator from Mississippi but to-day there are hundreds of young men and young women who have come to the Louisiana State University from the State of Mississippi.

The Oil Trust said to us, however: "We are not going to pay these taxes," and in order to avoid it they proceeded to go to Venezuela and Colombia, and within sight of that great State university, which was a haven and an institution for the learning and for the embellishment of this Nation, they proceeded to bring in the tariff-free oil from these foreign countries, and it was impossible for the State of Louisiana to collect a tariff on its domestic production because the domestic producers could not produce oil upon which they had to pay a tax of 11 cents a barrel in competition with oil brought from Colombia, on which there was no tax or tariff whatsoever.

I am pleading here now for funds for that school, and for the other schools in my State, because the oil of Colombia and of other foreign countries has been brought in there duty free, so that $1,000,000 a year has been taken from the educational funds of the State of Louisiana and that great institution. There are many in this body who know it and who love it. That great institution to-night turns its arm as it is being stabbed by those who promote the foreign oil trade, as it is being attacked, robbed, and ravaged as a result of a law which enables the slave traffic oil to come into that country and deprive that institution of the tax upon the products produced in that State; that institution, which has opened its arms to the Senator from Mississippi, looks to him to-night and appeals to him as it gathers together whatever garment it has to protect itself from the stabs of this slave traffic; and as it looks to the Senator from Mississippi, who ought to be voting, we feel, for the protection of that institution, as he did for the protection of the cotton fields in Mississippi, as it looks to him sitting among contrary Senators it says, "Et tu quoque, mi fili."

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, perhaps I ought to pass unnoticed the wholly irresponsible talk of the Senator from Louisiana. But no Senator has the authority to lecture me or to criticize me, and the Senator from Louisiana will not be accorded that privilege.

I stated to the Senator, and I have stated to him repeatedly, that my record in this body is an open book, that I have voted for agricultural tariffs. I did my best to give a fair degree of protection to the farm products, whether grown in my State or in any other State. Long-staple cotton is not grown in my State, but I voted for a tariff on it, nevertheless.

During the consideration of the Smoot-Hawley bill, I voted repeatedly for the lowest duties we could insert upon many products manufactured in my State. I was compelled to vote against the steel people of my State. I was compelled to vote against many other manufactures of my State, and for duties which they earnestly pleaded with me not to support.

I voted in the consideration of that bill as I shall vote now, against the tariff on lumber, although lumber is manufactured in my State.

I will vote against a tariff on copper, in this bill, although there is a copper mine in my State.

I have no record of having favored duties merely because the industries to be affected by them were in my State, sir. I have no such record as that. But I have voted against high duties when the interests in my State demanded them, and the difference between the Senator from Louisiana and myself is that I am not amenable to the demands of special interests whenever they call me to register a vote simply and solely because they happen to have an interest in my State.

Every duty that has been asked upon a product in my State has been weighed upon its merits, and no promise or threat, and no pressure by anyone within the State, has yet induced me to support such a duty when I did not think it was a fair and just duty.

On the contrary, I voted for very many more reduced rates upon products made within my State than for increased rates upon products and articles produced in my State. I have no apologies to make for my record. I am going to suggest to the Senator from Louisiana now that it would be far better for him to leave the Republican Party to answer rather than come to its defense when one of his colleagues feels impelled to stand upon this floor and to say frankly to the chairman of the Finance Committee, when he pleads for speed, "Twenty-four hours ago I pleaded for speed," and that his plea comes too late if he intends to carry within the cradle of this bill the protective tariffs which have been written in the bill.

Mr. President, I do not want to indulge in mere personal denunciation or mere personal condemnation of the Senator from Louisiana. The Senator has not been here very long. I think perhaps that when he has been here longer, he will respect the conscientious convictions of his colleagues. He probably will consult with them more than he does with the Republican leadership on the other side of the aisle. He will not be concerned about the record that his colleagues have made. It will be, I dare say, a sufficient test of his strength to take care of his own record. Neither the Senator from Louisiana nor any other Senator can lecture me.

I said, when I rose to reply to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], that four arguments had been made according to the advocates of the oil tariff against that tariff, and that they were the four great oil companies. I replied, mincing no words or language, that the four arguments for the tariff rates in this bill are coal and oil and lumber and copper.

I have never traded a vote in this body for the vote of a single Senator for a single item affecting my State; and I would walk out of the Senate to-night, never to enter its doors again, rather than trade my vote to procure a grant of special privilege for a single industry within my State. But, if the Senator from Louisiana can gather comfort or consolation from that unholy alliance and combination of which he is a part, he is quite welcome to that consolation.

Of these four items in the bill, half of them—copper and lumber—represent important industries in my State. Appeals have been made to me to support those industries. I have said that when the credit of the country was at stake, I would not inject these tariff items into the tax bill. I have never said that we could not properly include them in a tariff bill. But I question the wisdom even of the Senator from Louisiana when he holds his hands at the throat of the Nation itself, now in need of revenue, and demands special privileges for the industries of his State as the price of an adequate revenue bill for the relief of his country.

Now, if the Senator from Louisiana wishes to produce my record hereafter, he may do so; or if he wishes to lecture me, he may do so. I have no unkind feeling for him. I have gone on here in the way that seemed to me fitting and proper and presented my views. I always have presented them seriously. I never have fought a sham battle and I never will. My State may demand special privileges, and it does need help from any worthy source; but I will not stand here when I realize the dire distress of this country—a condition which my party has not created, but that is not involved—and insist upon such special privilege or even the consideration of a measure that might under other conditions and circumstances be just and proper and thereby delay the enactment of the tax bill. That, Mr. President, is the head and front of my offending.

Mr. President, I am entirely indifferent to buffoonery and clownishness wherever it appears. Let me caution—or, if I may put it the other way—let me admonish the Senator from Louisiana that he may serve his country well if he will leave to the Senators on the other side of this Chamber—the party whose President has converted the Treasury of the United States not only into a community chest but into an empty community chest—to offer their own defense at the bar of public opinion in this country.

I come back to the words that I uttered a while ago—that it has seemed to me for more than 20 months that no public man could afford to indulge in idle generalities, in meaningless language. I again assert that the election made by the party in power in the Senate, whoever is responsible for the form in which the bill found itself when it reached the Senate, has made clear my course, and that is to vote for the 1918 rates and against every excise tax in the bill.

If we are to give to coal and to copper and to lumber and to oil a privilege, not for the enrichment of the Treasury—because at most only an incidental benefit can flow to the Treasury—but a privilege for their own enrichment, whether deserved or undeserved, then I shall elect to stand upon my rights and vote for a tax bill which my judgment approves.

Mr. President, I beg the pardon of the Senate for having spoken again. I would not have done so but for the fact that the Senator from Louisiana, following a Senator as he tries to do his duty with what he pleases to call the record of the Senator, rising upon this floor endeavoring to embarrass, without the slightest sense of courtesy—I was about to say decency—seemed to make it necessary that at least I resent that sort of conduct, and that I defend myself against that sort of insinuation and insult.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I am sure the Senator did not object to my reading the record. What is it that I have said that he objects to? I am unconscious of anything except having read that record.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not object to the Senator having read my record. I have never objected to that. But if the Senator is unconscious of what he has done, he confirms, without more from me, what I have said about him. He is utterly lacking in the sensibilities which usually characterize the intercourse between men in this body.

Mr. DILL obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator from Utah want to go on to-night?

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington has the floor.

Mr. DILL. I merely yielded to the Senator from Utah to learn whether he wanted to take a recess. If so, I do not care to speak to-night.

Mr. SMOOT. I know of about four more speeches to be made upon the subject. It is now after 10 o'clock. I think perhaps it would be just as well to take a recess now, but if there is objection I shall not make that motion.

Mr. DILL. I am perfectly willing to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. I have already secured unanimous consent that when we conclude our business to-day, we shall recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, there has been no argument advanced by members of the committee who filed a protest against the bill. Are we not going to have a chance? I hope the Senator will move a recess at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to do so, and if there is no objection that is what I shall ask the Senate now to do.

Mr. President, in conformity with the unanimous-consent agreement previously entered into, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before the question is put let me say that I had understood that we were going to recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. SMOOT. I tried to get an agreement to recess until 10 o'clock, and to have an early adjournment in the afternoon, but it was impossible to secure it.

Mr. HARRISON. It was impossible to reach such an agreement?

Mr. SMOOT. It was. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 10 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), under the order previously entered, took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, May 21, 1932, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MAY 20, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rabbi R. B. Hershon, of Temple Beth El, Asbury Park, N. J., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, frail humanity stands bewildered in this great confusion which has covered the face of the earth. Prostrated before this untoward desolation of peace and confused by the colossal problems of the day they know not whither to turn. Man, who has vainly tried to pyramid gigantic power and derisively challenged the prophetic dictum to love mercy, to pursue justice, and to walk humbly with thy God, stands like a beggar with his cap in his hand at Thy throne, O God, seeking now Thy protection and imploring Thy guidance.

Upon these blessed United States and this august assembly a major proportion of this world's responsibility fate seems to have placed, to give succor to the needy, aid to the weary, help to the stricken, and hope to the world.

Bless us, then, O God, that the deliberations and the convocations of this House may be forever guided by Thy wisdom, and that from the lips of those whose voices reverberate in these Halls may there always come an echo of humility and prayer. For the purest offering of prayer is that which springs from our sympathy with the afflicted and our compassion with the downtrodden. Free from all selfish motives it inspires the love of our fellow men and sanctifies the purposes for which we strive. As the sweet singer of Israel saith, "The Lord is my portion, saith my soul; therefore will I hope in Him."

So be with us, O God, this day and evermore. We ask this in Thy own name, O Heavenly Father. Amen. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GOV. CHARLES B. AYCOCK

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a brief statement. I am requested by the Governor of North Carolina and the Aycock Statue Commission to invite the Members of the House to attend the exercises this afternoon in Statuary Hall at 3 o'clock, when North Carolina will present to the United States a statue of former Gov. Charles B. Aycock.

ELIZABETH D. HARTNEY

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 216

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Elizabeth D. Hartney, widow of Benson B. Hartney, late an employee of the House, an amount equal to six months' compensation and an additional amount, not exceeding $250, to defray funeral expenses of the said Benson D. Hartney.

The resolution was agreed to.

PAY-ROLL RECORDS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 227, to authorize public inspection of pay-roll records of the disbursing officer of the House of Representatives and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina calls up a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 227

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized and directed to keep open for public inspection the pay-roll records of the disbursing officer of the House of Representatives

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I did not grasp what the resolution is. May we have it again reported?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will again be reported.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 80]

Abernethy	Corning	Igoe	Reid, Ill.
Allgood	Crowther	Jenkins	Robinson
Auf der Heide	Curry	Johnson, Ill.	Seiberling
Bacon	Davenport	Johnson, Wash.	Shallenberger
Baldrige	Dickstein	Karch	Shannon
Beck	Douglas, Ariz.	Kendall	Shreve
Beedy	Doutrich	Kennedy	Simmons
Bloom	Drane	Lamneck	Sirovich
Bohn	Dyer	Lea	Stokes
Boylan	Erk	Lehlbach	Strong, Kans.
Britten	Eslick	Lewis	Sullivan, N. Y.
Browning	Estep	Lindsay	Sullivan, Pa.
Bulwinkle	Fiesinger	McDuffie	Tucker
Burdick	Freeman	Mitchell	Vinson, Ga.
Cary	Gibson	Mouser	Watson
Celler	Gifford	Murphy	Welsh, Pa.
Chapman	Golder	Nelson, Wis.	Withrow
Chase	Goldsborough	Norton, N. J.	Wood, Ind.
Clark, N. C.	Granfield	Oliver, N. Y.	Yon
Collier	Hall, Miss.	Owen
Connery	Hoch	Perkins
Cooke	Hollister	Ragon

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and forty-six Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

THE PRESENT ECONOMIC SITUATION

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a radio speech delivered by me last evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me over the radio on Thursday evening, May 19:

For 10 years past the Republican Party controlled all branches of the Federal Government. Under legislation for which they are responsible less than 10 per cent of our people own 90 per cent of the wealth of our country—a calamitous condition for any nation. High tariff laws are principally responsible.

Nothing has contributed more to the economic undoing of the world than the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, which has caused retaliatory tariffs to be levied against us by foreign countries, thus destroying our export market for cotton and other agricultural and industrial products. With our foreign market destroyed and these commodities selling below the cost of production, our agricultural interests are bankrupt and the purchasing power of 30,000,000 people destroyed, inevitably affecting every industry. With the retaliatory tariffs against us, if we alone should now reduce our tariffs without some concession from foreign nations, our economic plight might be made worse. Seeking to correct this evil, the Democratic House passed a tariff bill requesting the President to call an international conference with leading nations of the world to consider reciprocal tariff agreements. Such a law should help the situation, but the President vetoed it.

In my judgment, there can be no complete economic recovery until there is an increase in the price of basic commodities. To bring this about it is essential that there be some sound expansion of the currency and bank credits to stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar, now abnormally high as to its purchasing power as applied to agricultural commodities. The purchasing power of the dollar must be stabilized based on the average prices of commodities for the years 1921 to 1929. This would make cotton to-day worth above 15 cents a pound, wheat over $1 per bushel, and hogs 10 cents per pound. A debt contracted two years ago by the farmer who could produce ten bales of cotton, ample at that time to liquidate the debt, would require twenty-eight bales today to liquidate the debt. A debt contracted by the farmer even last year based on the belief that his production of ten bales of cotton would pay the debt will require twenty bales today to pay it. The same is true as to the wheat producer and every other individual who has contracted debts. Congress must find some solution to this problem. In my judgment, there must be some expansion of the circulating medium to meet the situation. The Democratic House has passed a law known as the Goldsborough stabilization law, which directs the Federal Reserve Board to expand currency sufficiently to bring this about.

The Federal Reserve Board, admittedly, under the law can expand currency $5,000,000,000, amply secured by eligible discount paper plus 40 per cent gold reserve, insuring the stability of the American dollar on the gold standard. It is the duty of the President to require the Federal Reserve Board to do this, as he has the power to remove from office the members of the board if they do not act. Nothing will benefit the masses more than such a policy, and I am earnestly advocating it.

It is deplorable that in the last two years the Government has spent over $3,000,000,000 more than its revenues. It is daily spending $7,000,000 more than its receipts. The Republican Party is responsible for this deficit. The Constitution of the United States places the duty upon the House of Representatives to levy taxes to pay the debts of the United States. In this critical national emergency it is indefensible to place partisanship above the country's welfare. Realizing, of course, the unpopularity of levying taxes, nevertheless the Democratic House of Representatives measured up to its constitutional responsibility and passed a tax bill that would balance the Budget, based on the assumption that there should also be at least $200,000,000 reduction in Government expenditures. The bill is now pending in the Senate.

Personally I believe a $4,000,000,000 Budget in peace time is excessive, burdensome, confiscatory, and destructive of love of Government, and that it should be reduced at least five hundred millions. To accomplish this, overlapping activities in the various bureaus should be eliminated, useless expensive boards and commissions abolished, governmental expenditures cut to the bone, and salaries from the highest to those affording a minimum wage reduced—and this Democratic House has passed a bill reducing by 11 per cent salaries over $2,500, including, of course, those of Congressmen, whose salaries are reduced $825 per year. I voted to reduce all salaries of over $1,000, but a majority voted against it. I regret the emasculation of the recent economy bill in the House, but some of the items eliminated were controversial both as regards the efficiency of our national security and as to actually effecting economy, for example, the consolidation of the Army and Navy. The bill as passed is estimated to save $42,000,000 directly and many millions indirectly. It also confers upon the President the power—subject to veto by Congress within 60 days—to consolidate and abolish bureaus.

My friends, do not believe these are the only savings effected by this Congress. The supply bills as passed by the House were reduced a hundred and sixty-six millions below the President's recommendations for appropriations, and the Senate is still further reducing them. All reductions to date below the President's recommendations total over two hundred and sixteen millions, and they should and I am hoping they will reach two hundred and fifty to three hundred and fifty millions of dollars. The appropriations passed by this Congress, taking into account cuts made by the President in his Budget recommendations, are about six hundred millions below appropriations for similar objects for the current fiscal year. If further substantial reductions are to be made in governmental expenditures, no new large appropriations can be authorized. It may interest you to know that 25 cents out of every dollar spent by the Government goes to the veterans in the way of hospitalization, compensation, insurance, etc., and another 25 cents goes for interest on the national debt and its retirement. Thus 50 cents out of every dollar, or $2,000,000,000 yearly, or half of our total Budget, is chargeable to war. All agree that it is the bounden duty of the Government to care for its disabled heroes and their dependents. Is not the Government measuring up to this sacred duty? The Ways and Means Committee has decided adversely as to the immediate payment of the adjusted-service certificates, which, if paid now, would cost the Government about two billions four hundred millions more than was originally contemplated when the law was passed in 1925.

The condition of the Treasury and the tax burdens resting upon the people, in my judgment, prevent payment to our brave veterans of this colossal sum at this time. I will not vote for it. The people demand that Government extravagances cease and that taxes be reduced, and I am in perfect accord with them.

To-day organized minorities control legislation. The only way to remedy this is for the unorganized masses of the people to become aroused, take an interest in elections, and support actively those candidates who are seeking to serve them. The preservation of the people's interest, if not their self-preservation, dictates such a policy. If they speak in no uncertain tones, legislators will hear and obey them. In this Congress, during this critical period of our country's economic distress, and with the suffering of our people greater even than while we were at war, in my capacity as a Congressman, I have eschewed politics and have placed country above party and self, and I shall unswervingly adhere to such a policy. Would that the members of the President's household, notably Secretaries Hyde and Hurley, would do likewise while the President is urging cooperation between the parties during this emergency.

I am glad the President is at last aroused to the necessity for economy. Would that he had evidenced an active interest in it for the past two years before the huge deficit in the Treasury became a reality. Do you know that the Alien Custodian Property Bureau and the war-time Railway Administration are both flourishing, with personnel drawing good salaries, 13 years after the war? It is also regrettable that when the House Democratic Economy Committee asked of the Cabinet officers how savings could be effected in their departments they received little aid. The Attorney General stated that the appropriation for his department could not be reduced without closing the courts and the Secretary of State advised that his could not be reduced without closing 10 or more embassies abroad.

May I not say in conclusion that I am whole-heartedly in favor of reducing Government expenditures and will cooperate with the President and others interested to the fullest extent? Believing that without a balanced Budget there can be no economic recovery, I deem the paramount duties of Congress to be to balance the Budget, based on a substantial reduction of Government expenditures; to enact some economically sound relief measure to give employment; to provide for some regulated expansion of the currency; and to adjourn.

CONTROL OF FLOODS ON THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AND ITS TRIBUTARIES

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the chairman of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 167.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia calls up a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 4668, a bill to amend the act entitled "An act for the control of floods on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and for other purposes," approved May 15, 1928.

That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, and shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Flood Control, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and any amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, of the time at my disposal I yield 30 minutes to the ranking minority member of the Committee on Rules to be disposed of as he sees fit.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to provide for consideration of the bill H. R. 4668, which is a bill reported by the Committee on Flood Control proposing an amendment to section 3 of the flood control act of 1928. This section as it now stands is as follows:

Except when authorized by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, no money appropriated under authority of this act shall be expended on the construction of any item of the project until the States or levee districts have given assurances satisfactory to the Secretary of War that they will (a) maintain all flood-control works after their completion, except controlling and regulating spillway structures, including special relief levees; maintenance includes normally such matters as cutting grass, removal of weeds, local drainage, and minor repairs of main river levees; (b) agree to accept land turned over to them under the provisions of section 4; (c) provide without cost to the United States all rights of way for levee foundations and levees on the main stem of the Mississippi River between Cape Girardeau, Mo., and the Head of Passes.

It is proposed to insert immediately preceding the section as now written the following:

SEC. 3. In the execution of the adopted project, the United States shall provide flowage rights over all lands including compensation for damages to improvements thereon at the time of the taking, which are not now between the existing levees and the low-water channel of the Mississippi River and which will be between the levee lines of the adopted project and the low-water channel of the Mississippi River by reason of setbacks, extensions, or other changes in the levee lines on the main stem of the Mississippi River between Cape Girardeau, Mo., and the Head of the Passes. The States or levee districts may provide for the United States, upon its request and at its expense, such flowage rights, and the United States shall reimburse the States or levee districts in full for all payments made and expense incurred in providing such flowage rights upon proof that they have been obtained at fair valuation and at reasonable expense.

And to add at the end of the section this language:

This act shall take effect from and after the date of the enactment of the flood control act of May 15, 1928.

By this bill an attempt is being made to make effective the intention of the Congress at the time of the flood control act of 1928 was adopted. The House appreciates the fact that the act was the outgrowth of two unprecedented floods that had recently occurred in the lower valley of the Mississippi. It was the flood of 1927 which resulted in the destruction of more than $200,000,000 of property and a loss of more than 200 lives that so aroused the country as to bring about a determined demand for some comprehensive legislation that would take care of such conditions.

In the act of 1928 Congress first gave recognition to the principle of national responsibility for the control of the flood waters of the river. It was not the first expression of Congress of an interest in the subject, because Congress had many years previously set up the Mississippi River Commission which had, from time to time, done work toward the improvement of the river. While, of course, as expressed in all the legislation, the purpose of the Government in the execution of these works under the supervision and control of the Mississippi River Commission was to improve navigation, the improvement of the river for purposes of navigation involved the question of flood control; but there had been no acknowledgment or admission of national responsibility so far as the control of flood waters was concerned.

In 1928 the Congress adopted the act referred to as the flood control act, and while the principle of local responsibility to the extent that there should be exacted some local contribution was recognized, yet the Congress in this act, and with specific reference to the project it adopted, declared that local interests had contributed to the control of the flood waters in the alluvial valley to the full extent of their responsibility, and whatever the cost of the construction of protective works might be that would effectively control flood waters was upon the General Government.

In section 2 of that bill there is found this language:

That it is hereby declared to be the sense of Congress that the principle of local contribution toward the cost of flood-control work, which has been incorporated in all previous national legislation on the subject, is sound; as recognizing the special interest of the local population in its own protection, and as a means of preventing inordinate requests for unjustified items of work having no material national interest. As a full compliance with this principle, in view of the great expenditure estimated at approximately $292,000,000, heretofore made by the local interests in the alluvial valleys of the Mississippi River for protection against the floods of that river; in view of the extent of national concern in the control of these floods in the interests of national prosperity, the flow of interstate commerce, and the movement of the United States mails; and in view of the gigantic scale of the project, involving flood waters of a volume and flowing from a drainage area largely outside the States most affected and far exceeding those of any other river in the United States, no local contribution to the project herein adopted is required.

Now, mark you, in so far as the execution of the adopted project is concerned, there was a declaration made by the Congress that no contribution of any amount, in addition to what had already been made, should be exacted of local interests.

This brings me to a consideration of the conditions with which this bill deals.

In the execution of the project it was found by the engineers of the War Department, in many instances, that by abandoning protective works that were the result of more than 100 years of effort on the part of local interests, and contributed to by the General Government, in that the Government, through the Mississippi River Commission, had adopted the levee lines that had been set up by local interests and had been maintaining and otherwise improving these levee lines through all the years for the purpose of controling the river, in order that it might advance and improve its conditions, so far as navigation is concerned. Along the river there are certain bends which the engineers found, in the execution of the project after the act had been adopted and after the declaration of Congress was made that local interests should not be required to contribute, might be cut off and entirely new levee lines constructed, which would result in a considerable saving to the Government; and the engineers in the exercise of their discretion in the execution of this project have deviated in many instances from the original levee lines and have set up levees which cut off into the intended main channel of the river areas, which, in effect, dedicate the properties in question to a public use, and there is resistance on the part of the War Department to the demand for just compensation.

Let me direct your attention to one specific case that I have in mind. It is down in Arkansas, and involves the land known as Pecan Point. Let me illustrate it here on this chart. Here is a bend in the river that comes back within 2 miles of where the first bend occurs.

This is not an extreme case; it is a fair illustration of all other cases where land has been taken through arbitrary and seemingly senseless changes in the original levee lines made by the engineers of the War Department and in reckless if not willful disregard of the rights of landowners whose property has been destroyed.

As I say, you find the river makes this bend here and comes back within 2 miles of where the bend began. Along the banks of the river there are levees, and they have been there for more than a hundred years. They are the development of local enterprise, and the Government has, since the creation of the Mississippi River Commission, helped to maintain them.

In destroying this tract of land by this cut-off levee the Government saved $400,000—the difference between the cost of strengthening the levee around the bend by revetment and otherwise and the cost of the cut-off levy. The cost of improving the original line was estimated at $600,000 and that of new line at $200,000, and still there is objection to compensating the owners of this land that has been taken from them.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Can the gentleman state what is the value of the land proposed to be flooded?

Mr. COX. I regret that I can not; but the value of this particular tract would hardly run over $100,000. Certainly flowage rights could be acquired for this amount.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I can give the gentleman from Illinois a direct answer. The land in question consists of 3,200 acres in this point, 3,000 of which is highly cultivated and in splendid shape, with valuable buildings upon it.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. What is the value per acre?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I have forgotten that; but it is fine agricultural land.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. My purpose in asking was to ascertain whether the value was being taken into consideration in the expenditure.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Oh, the valuation of the land justifies the cost of its protection. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia if it was not shown in the hearings that a certain property owner in that area did take the matter up with the Government engineers to ascertain whether it was the purpose of the Government to continue the levees as located, and that he had the assurance of the engineers that that was their purpose?

Mr. COX. A witness came before the committee and testified at length, and as a part of his testimony he filed a letter that he had from an engineer of the War Department, in charge of river work, which was in response to an inquiry from him, if it was the intention of the War Department to ever cut this point off into the main channel of the river, and in that letter the representative of the War Department declared that such was not the intention of the Government; and the man, with that assurance, bought part of the property and erected on it a magnificent country home.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. There is no one in the War Department who would have any right to commit the Congress of the United States on any policy.

Mr. COX. Of course not; but that was the assurance given the prospective purchaser, and with that the purchaser bought the property; but that is beside the question. This property here, during all of the years, never has been subject to overflow from the river, and the construction of this line of levee was simply to eliminate a bottleneck in the river which, it is presumed, the engineers thought would result in the piling up of flood waters and the making of it more difficult to control at other points on the stream.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand it, this bill applies to the whole river from Cape Girardeau down through?

Mr. COX. It does.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman tell me how many acres of land the Government will have to buy if the bill is enacted into law?

Mr. COX. I can not answer the gentleman's question. I do not know.

Mr. SNELL. Does anybody know?

Mr. REID of Illinois. Yes. They would not have to buy any land. All they would have to do would be to use good engineering sense and follow the original plan, which provided that the levees should be rebuilt where they are, and we appropriated $100,000,000 in the flood control bill in order to protect the levees from falling in, so that it would not cost one penny if the Army engineers would use good engineering sense. Is not that true?

Mr. COX. That is true.

Mr. SNELL. Let me ask this question. As I read the provision in section 3 it is that this shall be provided, the flowage rights—that is, at the expense of the Federal Government—and they shall be obtained by the State. What does that mean?

Mr. COX. The evident intention of that language is to secure State aid in obtaining needed lands at fair prices. The sole obligation that was put on local interests in the first instance was furnishing the beds for the levees where relocation became necessary. There was no intention upon the part of anyone—and certainly it was not the intention of the Committee in reporting the bill, and, if I may say so, not the intention of Congress when it enacted it into law—to make any demands on local interests for contribution of anything in the way of property or otherwise other than the mere beds for the levees that they might find it necessary to relocate.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman will admit that when we had the bill before the House the real discussion centered around the point of whether the Federal Government should buy land down there or not.

Mr. COX. That related to the backwater areas.

Mr. SNELL. I admit that is true; but there are going to be some backwater areas here if you go through with this bill, and what I want to know is how many acres you are providing for that we may possibly have to buy? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REID] says that we will not have to buy any.

Mr. COX. You might obtain flowage rights.

Mr. SNELL. How many acres, and how much will it cost? If the engineers are in favor of it, why are they opposed to it at the present time?

Mr. COX. It is no surprise to me that the engineers are against this bill. As the gentleman says, they are. They were against the original legislation as it passed out of this House. From earliest times man has encroached upon the banks of rivers for the use of the rich soils in the valleys, and from this contest with the elements there was evolved the rule that everyone has the right to protect his property with dikes of levees to keep back the waters, without being responsible to his neighbors or to the owners on the other side of the stream. It was recognized that they have the equal right to protect themselves by similar means. On the other hand, there grew with the doctrine another of equal force, that "the free flow of water in rivers was secured from undue interference or burden created by obstructions to the flow, by deflections in its course, or any other act limiting the right to enjoy the flow or causing additional burdens by changing it." It follows that if the private individual who constructs a levee for the protection of his own property, so long as he does not interfere with the natural flow of the stream, is not liable to others for the effect thereof; neither is the Government, the State, levee boards, nor other similar agencies which contribute to or assume control of such works for the benefit of the public. The War Department probably takes the view that in improving the river for the public good there is no taking of the property in question, but only a subjection of it to a servitude to which it has always been liable.

In other words that—

> So long as the owner remains clothed with the legal title to the land and is not ousted from the physical possession thereof his property is not taken, no matter to what extent his right to use it is invaded or destroyed or its present or prospective value is depreciated. This is an erroneous view. The right of property, as used in the Constitution, has no such limited meaning.

Mr. Justice Day said:

> Property is more than the mere thing which a person owns. It is elementary that it includes the right to acquire, use, and dispose of. The Constitution protects these essential attributes of property.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, has a case deciding this question been before the Supreme Court?

Mr. COX. This case here, this particular case?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. COX. In United States v. Cress (243 U. S. 716) the court, through Mr. Justice Pitney, said:

> Power of the Federal Government to improve navigable streams in the interest of interstate and foreign commerce must be exercised, when private property is taken, in subordination of the fifth amendment.

Mr. BRIGGS. I was under the impression that there was some litigation growing out of this.

Mr. COX. There was a case, Hurly et al. against Kincaid, decided by the Supreme Court February 23, 1932, but did not settle the question here involved.

Mr. BRIGGS. Has there not been some judicial determination by the final court of the United States upon this subject?

Mr. COX. Yes; there had been some. The question was decided in United States v. Lynch (188 U. S. 445) and in the case of Pumpelly against Green Bay—I do not recall the volume in which it is reported—and there are many other cases.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman is making a very informative statement, but it is very natural for the members of the committee to inquire, those who are in sympathy with this legislation, as to the extent of the mandate to the United States Government to provide flowage rights for certain lands described in the bill. May I inquire the approximate area and the approximate value?

Mr. COX. I think the cases that are given in the report of the committee which reported the bill cover practically all the cases.

Mr. GARBER. But it does not state the area; neither does it state the estimated value.

Mr. COX. Well, I can not give the gentleman that information.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it not true that both the Federal and States courts have held, since the foundation of our Government, in considering the Federal and State Constitutions, that the damaging of property is a taking within the meaning of the Constitution?

Mr. COX. The Supreme Court has held that the Government, in the improvement of the levee line of the river for navigation purposes, is not liable if some one down the river, miles away, suffers as a result of the water being thrown on his land, stating that it is consequential and must be suffered without damage; but that principle does not apply where the Government through the change of leases imposes a servitude which deprives the owner of land of the enjoyment of any of its elements of value—designed servitude is a taking within the meaning of the Constitution, so the gentleman is correct in his statement.

The constitutional rights of the people at certain points on the river are being invaded, and that, too, by agents of the Federal Government. In their desire to improve the public condition they are seeking to achieve by a shorter cut than the constitutional way of paying for what they take, and in this connection let me quote Mr. Justice Bradley in the case of Boyd v. United States (116 U. S. 616, 635), who said:

> Illegitimate and unconstitutional practices get their first footing by silent approaches and slight deviations from legal methods of procedure.

Having specific reference to the effort of the agents of the Government to escape the responsibility that is imposed under the fifth amendment of the Constitution.

Quoting further:

> This can only be obviated by adhering to the rule that constitutional provisions for the security of person and property should be liberally construed. A close and literal construction deprives them of half their efficacy and leads to gradual depreciation of the right, as if it consisted more in sound than in substance. It is the duty of courts to be watchful for the constitutional rights of the citizen and against any stealthy encroachments thereon.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. We will admit all of that. What we would like to know is how many acres it is proposed to buy and how much it will cost?

Mr. COX. I can not answer that question.

Mr. SNELL. Other gentlemen here have said they can.

Mr. COX. But there is no mandate in the law that the Government shall go out of the appropriation already made and authorized in the payment for any property which the Government, in the execution of the project, has found it necessary to take. The saving that will be effected by reason of change will probably be sufficient to pay for the property taken, but if not sufficient, this is no excuse for refusing to pay.

The question that should challenge the minds of Members of Congress is, Has the Government, under the circumstances that have been stated, taken property of its citizens? If it has taken it, then under the fifth amendment to the Constitution it is required to compensate the citizen to the extent of his damage.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. BECK. If that is so and there be a taking, there is no amendment required. There is a remedy to get full compensation for the taking.

Mr. COX. I expected that that question would be asked, and expected the gentleman to ask it. I take the position that under the law as it is, a private citizen has the right, when the Government comes in and seizes his property and dedicates it to public use, to go into the courts and enforce his constitutional rights. That has been done. A citizen of the State of Louisiana sought to obtain injunctive relief. The district court held with him. The circuit court of appeals held with him. The Government prosecuted the case to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court held that he had no right of injunction under the law. So, as the owner of a small tract of land, he is subjected to the expense of going over the whole ground again. Such an attitude on the part of the Government means, due to expense of long litigation, the small property owner is deprived of his constitutional rights, and, that too, by the Government itself. The purpose of the proposed amendment to the flood control act is to require the Government to compensate the owner of land at the time of the taking, and in good conscience this should be done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HORNOR). The Chair will count. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 81]

Abernethy	Browning	Corning	Fulmer
Allgood	Burdick	Crowther	Gasque
Almon	Cary	Davenport	Gibson

Lewis	Perkins	Strong, Kans.	Yon
Lindsay	Person	Sullivan, N. Y.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Three hundred and forty-four Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. PURNELL. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is apparent, of course, that for some reason there is a filibuster in progress to prevent a vote on the rule. I wonder if the cause of the filibuster might be removed by some form of agreement with reference to the distribution of the time or otherwise?

Mr. PURNELL. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama I have no knowledge of any filibuster.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from Indiana has been in the Chamber and is a rather observant gentleman, usually.

Mr. PURNELL. I have some requests for time, and I was proceeding to continue the debate as far as I have it within my power to yield time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I merely desire to suggest to the gentleman from Indiana if this procedure is continued it will merely penalize consideration of the Private Calendar. Of course the gentleman knows this measure will be the continuing order of business until it is disposed of.

Mr. PURNELL. I have no disposition to delay consideration of the matter, I will say to the gentleman. I only want to take about one minute before I yield to somebody who is opposed to the resolution.

The resolution was reported out by the Rules Committee on the 7th of March, almost two months and a half ago. I had no notice until I came into the Chamber this morning that the resolution would be called up to-day, although I have the honor of being the ranking Republican member of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. I yield.

Mr. COX. I undertook to communicate with the gentleman a week ago. Not finding him in attendance upon the House I talked at length with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], the next ranking member of the committee, and then informed him this resolution would be taken up immediately after consideration of the appropriation bill which was disposed of yesterday.

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman is no doubt correct.

Mr. COX. Further than that, I have yielded the gentleman from Indiana half of the time on the rule.

Mr. PURNELL. I am not now finding fault with the fact I received no notice. I can not yield farther.

I am not finding fault, but I am merely offering that as an excuse for what I am about to say. I know nothing about the resolution or the bill which it makes in order. I have a very hazy recollection of having had the gentleman from Louisiana appear before the committee and make a statement with reference to the bill. As far as I personally am concerned I have an open mind. I am not now opposing this resolution. I am in the position of one seeking information. There are some facts about which I personally should like to have further enlightenment. No one has yet satisfied me that the bill does not involve, directly or indirectly, further appropriations from the Federal Treasury. That is one of the things I wish to have cleared up.

In order that we may proceed and in order to take care of requests for time which have come to me I shall use no further time myself.

Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to take two or three minutes to call the attention of the House and of the committee to the rather anomalous position we are in at the present time, when Congress is using every effort to balance the Budget, making every effort to practice every economy possible, and when we had a statement from the distinguished Speaker of the House on yesterday that enormous additional expenditures might be necessary to meet the unemployment which stares us in the face at the present time; and yet in the face of all this the Democratic majority bring in a special rule for the consideration of a bill that from the best information I can get will open wide the doors of the Treasury, and there is no limit to the expense that may be incurred by reason of it.

I do not know who is back of this bill nor who is for it. It is absolutely impossible to find out from reading the report how many acres of land it is proposed to buy, how much the cost will be, or anything definite in regard to the whole proposition.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. WILSON. If we can adopt this rule and take up the consideration of this bill, we will probably have time to give some information in regard to the bill.

Mr. SNELL. I have read the report presented to the House and find there is not a single definite statement in the whole report that would give anyone a reason to vote for this proposition.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman from Louisiana agree to give us some time on this side?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. I can not get time over here.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to express my surprise, in view of what the gentleman from New York has just said, that at this late period in the session, after practically all of the opportunities for economy have passed, the gentleman has just waked up to the necessity for some economy.

Mr. SNELL. I have been awake on this question of economy all the time and the gentleman well knows it. I want to say to the gentleman I did not vote for the $132,000,000 road bill, nor a lot of others for which the gentleman voted. This action here just proves what I have said before, that you people are only talking economy. You do not really want it. I say right here and now that there is not a word in your report that would justify anyone voting for this bill. There is not a word of real information in it. You do not tell us anything about how much this is going to cost, how many acres you want to buy, or where it will lead. As far as any information I can get, the Army engineers, the people who have always worked on these propositions, the only people who have any definite knowledge about it, are absolutely opposed to what is proposed to-day.

Mr. DRIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. DRIVER. I want to suggest to the gentleman that it will be an impossibility for this matter to be determined by any other organization than the engineers in charge. If an opportunity is afforded we will give the number of acres now involved.

Mr. SNELL. Why was not that information carried in the report? Why does not the report tell us something about it? In the bill you are providing for the payment of these lands, if I can read it correctly. This is the provision:

> In the execution of the adopted project, the United States shall provide flowage rights over all lands, including compensation for damages to improvements thereon at the time of the taking.

With some exceptions, and so forth, and the Army engineers' report definitely against it.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. COX. The gentleman very properly is concerned about the question as to what additional money will be exacted from the Public Treasury if this bill is passed. Will the gentleman permit me to call his attention to the fact that in the change of the engineering plan, which has called for the offering of this resolution, there will be a saving of many millions of dollars?

Mr. SNELL. I can not yield further. I want to say to the House that I called the office of the Chief of Engineers this morning. I did not get the chief but I did get in touch with his ranking man. He said the estimate was entirely indefinite; that they knew nothing definite about it but felt it would be an extremely large expense and, in their judgment, it threw the doors of the Treasury wide open. If you gentlemen want to take the responsibility of doing that at this time, the responsibility is upon you and not upon us. But I want the country to know we are opposed to any such proposition or imposing any such unjustified or uncalled for authorization at this time.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to differ with my dear friend from Louisiana, for whom I have the most profound respect, he having been the chairman of a committee of which I was a member. However, I can not support this rule nor the bill which the rule makes in order.

At the time the original flood control bill was under discussion it was seriously suggested and urged that when the taxpayers of the country were asked to engage in this enormous expense—which may amount to one thousand millions of dollars before it is over—that the people whose lands were to be protected, and the States and counties immediately concerned should make some contribution. It was decided otherwise finally, and because of the awful devastation of that flood the Representatives from other States, though paying a large share of the taxes of the country, voted for it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the part of the country where I come from, betterment assessments are assessed against property that is improved. We all know the danger to which all of the property in the lower Mississippi Valley is subjected and that its value at present, on account of the danger of flood, is seriously impaired. If, therefore, the Nation is to protect this property and greatly increase its value, the people owning it ought, in fairness, to share the expense instead of asking for consequential damages.

Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to place an extra charge upon the Treasury which the proponents of the original act were not able to have inserted when the act was passed, and it opens the doors of the Treasury of the United States to the expenditure of untold millions for flowage.

Now, one particular case was called to the attention of the House on this map by the gentleman from Georgia. If any property is taken under the Constitution, the owners have their remedy under the Constitution. Something was said about an injunction which is an equitable process being denied by the Supreme Court of the United States; but under the Constitution, private property can not be taken for public use without just compensation.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DALLINGER. No; I can not yield.

As I have already pointed out, this bill puts an extra charge upon the Treasury that was not in the original bill. If a special case of hardship should arise, a private bill can be introduced; or if there are a number of such cases, Congress can refer them to the Court of Claims; but we should not pass this bill at a time when we are trying to cut down expenses and when we are trying to balance the Budget, because its enactment would open the door wide to the expenditure of untold millions from the Public Treasury. Mr. Speaker, I can not understand how any Member who is sincere in his desire to balance the Budget can vote for either the rule or the bill which the rule makes in order. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight and a half minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, never before have I known any instance where the Congress of the United States has sought to pay to these levee districts that under the law have paid for the rights of way the amounts that they have disbursed. This bill under the last section would compel the National Government to do this, because it is to be effective from the date of May 15, 1928, when we passed the flood control bill, and the amount of money that under the law the levee districts were obligated to pay runs into the millions.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me make my preliminary statement and then I shall yield.

In that fundamental act it was stated as the declared policy and declared to be the sense of Congress that the principle of local contribution toward the cost of control work should be continued, referring to the fact that the local levee districts in flood control had spent up to that time $292,000,000.

Later on in this act, in section 4, what do we find as the declared policy of Congress? Listen, gentlemen:

> Provide, without cost to the United States, all rights of way for levee foundations and levees on the main stream of the Mississippi River from Cape Girardeau, Mo., and the Head of Passes.

There was the obligation and the express condition on which the Congress entered upon this work.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. After I make my preliminary statement.

What was this policy? Take the hearings on the War Department appropriation bill of this year with respect to committing the Government on this flood-control work. Prior to the enactment of the general act we had been spending on the average $10,000,000 a year for flood control. In the act we passed yesterday there is appropriated $35,000,000 for flood control on the Mississippi River as a part of a total cost to the National Government under this act, as you will find on page 141 of the hearings, of $325,000,000.

Now you are seeking, just because your levee districts, perhaps, are in a little financial distress, to have the National Government take upon itself the payment of the rights of way for these levees that may have to be removed because the water has undermined the present existing site.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall yield later. I have some facts here which the gentleman did not have.

Let me call attention to what General Brown stated at page 144 of the hearings on the War Department appropriation bill as to the status of this levee work:

> General BROWN. The main-line levees including those on the tributaries to protect the side basins are about half completed now and they will probably be completed in 1935.

Of the $325,000,000 of obligation that the National Government took upon itself, under certain conditions which I have read, we have appropriated, including the $35,000,000 appropriated yesterday, $123,000,000.

What do you now propose to do? Under that act we did take upon ourselves the obligation to pay for all the flowage rights by basins back of New Orleans and these other two or three places, which were to divert the flood waters to protect these essentially dangerous places in case of heavy floods, and we are assuming that obligation and we are not attempting to dodge that obligation; but so far as levees are concerned, the established policy of the Government for 75 years, up to this moment, as declared in this act and all prior acts, as was stated in the act, has been that the procurement of the rights of way for these levees should be upon the local levee districts.

Mr. REID of Illinois. This bill does not change that.

Mr. STAFFORD. But you propose that when they move back the levees the National Government, instead of the levee districts, shall arrange for any damages that may be entailed, and I will say to you that these damages will be much more if this burden is thrown upon the National Government than if it is borne by the local levee districts, for the reason that many times when the levee is moved back a little distance, the land between can be safely tilled by constructing minor drainage works, but we all know that when the National Government is called upon to hold the bacon, then regardless of section of the country, and even here in the District, they will pile up their damages until Uncle Sam is further and further burdened with such expenditures.

I have tried in every way to vote consistently for economy, and here we have the testimony of the Chief of Engineers that the levee work is going on satisfactorily and will be completed within two years. There is nothing in his testimony on the War Department appropriation bill or in the hearings before the Flood Control Committee to show wherein the work is being held back, because the levee districts are not taking upon themselves their true obligation.

How many instances are there since May 15, 1928, when the localities under the promise sanctioned in the law agreed to pay for the rights of way? How many are there? Sixty or more, involving damages that have been paid of from $10,000 to $150,000.

Why do you not adhere to the bond that was entered into when we took this tremendous burden upon ourselves to the extent of $325,000,000? Why do you not adhere to the wording of the bond where it is expressly stated——

Mr. REID of Illinois. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I decline to yield now.

Where it is expressly stated that the levee districts shall provide, without cost to the United States, all rights of way for levee foundations and levees on the main streams?

Are you going to take the position now, that you got the Congress of the United States to agree to these terms under a false promise—a false promise in that you would call on Congress to abdicate that position—after Congress has appropriated the money that under the law it obligated itself to pay?

There are other districts in the country that are hard pressed. We have flood control in Milwaukee. We are not calling on the National Government to control the floods in the Milwaukee River. We have done more in the flood control of the Mississippi River to protect the great alluvial lands there than in any other section of the country. But, apparently, you are not satisfied with that. In these pressing times of economy you want to have the entire bag turned over to Uncle Sam.

For goodness sake, gentlemen, for one time try to be consistent in your pleas for economy. The $132,000,000 appropriation for good roads at this session is a long time past, but do not resurrect the same ghost of extravagance by disregarding your promise as stated in the law of 1928. [Applause.]

I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REID].

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, when this bill was first before the House in 1928, Chief of Engineers, General Jadwin, estimated that, as passed by the Senate, it would reach about a billion and a half dollars for all reservoirs and many millions for flowage lands and other flowage propositions previously reported by the committee, of which my friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REID] was chairman.

That bill as reported to the House and passed by the Senate was opposed by the President of the United States and by the entire Engineers Department of the United States. We opposed the bill here for five days in the House, and President Coolidge, with the advice of General Jadwin who had opposed it and helped in the fight, then through conferees cut it down from one and one-half billion dollars to about $318,000,000. A saving of more than a billion dollars was secured from the bill reported by a majority of the House committee as urged by a minority report I submitted. The Senate passed the House bill in just two hours debate, but it was thoroughly exposed when it reached the House.

We do not have much chance in this debate. The time is controlled by flood-control exponents on both Republican and Democratic sides, by Members in favor of the rule and a bill that may carry a hundred million dollars or several times that amount. Nobody knows what it will cost, but it involves a vast acreage that must be bought and paid for by the Federal Government at prices often ten times the actual value of the land taken. I have asked for 10 minutes to discuss the proposition and finally have been given time by the Republican side of the Rules Committee.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. No; I regret I can not yield. The gentlemen now on the committee had charge of the extravagant Senate bill when last before the House, but we defeated them. Here is the situation: The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], who helped me with the opposition when the Senate bill was then before the House, on my suggestion proposed one amendment, that only three times the total amount of assessed valuation of property should be recovered against the Government by local parties as damages for occasional flowage. That was opposed, because it was said by our Democratic friends it was a reflection on the people along the lower Mississippi River that they would not be fair. Senator Ransdell, of Louisiana, afterwards tried to explain to the Senate why the damages demanded and paid were ten times the total assessed value found on the Bonnet Carre flood way near New Orleans by a local board. Ten times the assessed value of the land was to be paid by the Government for occasional flowage. My colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has just explained that $123,000,000 has been appropriated to date since 1928, and the cost will probably exceed the $318,000,000 estimated in that bill because of land the Government is compelled to buy that is for flood protection of adjoining lands.

Will you get a fair estimate of values to be paid by the Government from any local boards?

Of course the Government will not. It has resulted as we predicted when we said the Government would be held up for many times the actual value of land that the States and localities ought to contribute for flood ways.

I want to read to the House from the Army engineers' report of 1931, which opposes these demands on the Government. It was going to cost $1,500,000,000, when reported to the House at the beginning. We put a stop to that in the House and cut it down, as stated, to less than one-quarter of that amount, but bills like the one before us will add hundreds of millions of dollars to be paid by American taxpayers for many times the value of flowage lands that ought to be contributed locally as the Government is paying for levees and all other flood protection to protect these people and lands against floods.

Let me read briefly what the Government engineers' report of February 28, 1931 says:

> That the adjustment of the equities of protection and lack of protection be left to those who alone can apply economically the benefits derived to such purposes, namely, the States and other local governmental agencies.

Again the report advises Congress:

> Provided that no protection works other than levees along the main stream or its tributaries shall be built by the United States in any State until, by appropriate legislation, the State shall have protected the United States from all claims on account of flood damages of any kind whatsoever within the State.

Again I quote from the report:

> Local interests shall furnish all rights of way and all flowage rights necessary for the execution of this project, except such as the United States has heretofore obligated itself to acquire at Bonnet Carre, La., and at Birds Point-New Madrid, Mo., and has actually acquired at other localities. The furnishing of rights of way and flowage rights by local interests is a condition precedent to entry by the United States on the work to which they pertain.

That is the advice of our Government engineers, but this bill demands that the Federal Government shall buy the land and pay all damages at prices to be fixed by local boards. The law department of the Government to which Congress always looks for advice, warns us:

> That no protection works other than levees along the main stream or its tributaries shall be built by the United States in any State, until by appropriate legislation, satisfactory to the Secretary of War, the State shall have protected the United States from all claims on account of flood damages of any kind whatsoever within the State.

We have here a proposition with no limit of expenditures put upon it. When first introduced the estimate was a billion and a half dollars, which, through threat of President Coolidge's veto and opposition in the House, was reduced to $318,000,000. This bill starts a heavy and new Government cost. You can not estimate what it will be now or ever, and yet you are asked to pass this enormously wasteful bill urged by our Democratic friends in an economy administration. Are you gentlemen on the Democratic side going to vote for a proposition of that kind? I ask you to help defeat the rule that has been suddenly presented.

Mr. Chairman, the last report referred to contains the following detailed advice:

> Reference is had to the report of the Chief of Engineers to Congress dated February 28, 1931, and to the marked clauses on pages 8, 13, and 14.

You will note the Chief of Engineers specifically recommends such an amendment, and the amendment above suggested is in almost the exact language of the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers.

The background of the situation is this: The act provides for three definite diversion constructions—New Madrid, Birds Point, and Bonnet Carre. The first diversion project is to protect the city of Cairo and the second another area in Missouri and the third the city of New Orleans. Each of these project constructions diverts water in the areas which would not be flooded under any circumstances except for the diversion constructions.

On the other hand, in time of flood it is expected that the water will flood the basins known as the Boeuf Basin and the Atchafalaya Basin. These basins are natural basins through which the flood water has always flowed in time of flood. To protect these basins and to localize the flow, the project provides for what is known as protection levees, also known as setback levees, which would guide the water, confine it to a smaller area, and prevent widespread flooding.

Under the Birds Point, New Madrid, Bonnet Carre diversions, the Government has also intended to acquire flowage rights over the land involved, and the Government is proceeding through condemnation to acquire such flowage rights. The prices that the Government has to pay for these flowage rights are extraordinarily exorbitant. In the great majority of cases, although the lands will be flooded probably not oftener than once in 12 years, we are paying more than the actual fee value of the land. In other words, the landowner is eating the cake and keeping it too.

But on the Boeuf and Atchafalaya Basins there is no intention on the part of the United States to pay for any flowage rights in those basins. The people who live in those basins, however, are insisting that flowage rights be acquired over all their lands, too, a claim which, in view of the amount of land involved, will ultimately obligate the Government to spend in the neighborhood of $500,000,000 to acquire flowage rights simply because of the action of the Government in attempting to protect that general section of the country.

When the flood control act was sent to Congress by President Coolidge, President Coolidge remarked in his message that it was to be expected that the local States would pay the larger part of the expense. Sufficient pressure was brought on Congress, however, so that Congress assumed the duty of carrying, as a national obligation, the entire flood-control project. In other words, the entire United States agreed to protect these lands from floods. Whether this was a good thing or not it at least was an act of unparalleled generosity on the part of the United States toward a section which has been deemed valuable because of its rich land, despite the floods. Not content with getting such generosity from the Government, these people now want the Government to pay, through the nose, for the very ground upon which the protection levees are to be built, and practically to buy all of the land between the protection levees, paying therefor more for the flowage rights, which may never be exercised, than the land itself is worth in fee simple.

The original flood control act contemplated the expenditure of approximately $300,000,000 after reduction from nearly five times that figure. There was no intention to pay for these flowage rights above referred to. If, however, flowage rights are to be paid for and we use our experience as to the prices we have had to pay at Birds Point, New Madrid, and Bonnet Carre, it will cost the United States $500,000,000. This $500,000,000 is simply a holdup. It is looking in the mouth of a gift horse with a vengeance.

Consequently, the Chief of Engineers, as you will notice, recommended that none of these protection levees be constructed unless the United States was freed from responsibility for flowage rights and the cost of levee sites. The bill proposed by the rule is vicious and should be defeated.

There is pending now in the Supreme Court the Kincaid case, which will probably be decided within the next two or three weeks, in which all of the work is being enjoined until the United States pays for these flowage rights. There is very great pressure, and there will be additional pressure in this Congress, to get the United States to affirmatively agree to pay not only for the levee system but for the ground on which it is built and then buy the land protected also.

Mr. Speaker, that statement is to be overruled and the court's decision set aside by this high-handed attempt to pass a wasteful and extravagant bill without previous notice. The rule should be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REID].

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the kindness of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL] in yielding me three minutes. I hope no one will be misled by the misleading statements that have been made up to the present time. The two gentlemen from Wisconsin, both together, do not know what this bill is about. The former bill provided that the Government should pay for the flowage rights. You are not amending that or touching it. The Army engineers submitted a plan, and this House passed it, to rebuild the levees as you see here, following the contour of the river. We passed that, and that is the law at the present time. The Army engineers decided that it would be easier from an engineering standpoint, and cheaper from a governmental standpoint, not having to take into consideration the cost of the land that would be thrown out and that would be useless, so they decided to cut across a short distance. In other words, you have one leg of a triangle. For that reason they have changed the plan. Is it fair to have these private owners who came down from Iowa and Indiana, and I think one individual from New York, and purchased the land under the present Army plan of flood control—now to have their land thrown in the flood way?

It is just like a sewer district in your town getting permission to put a sewer in a street in front of your home and then deciding, as long as it did not have to pay any damages, to cut across your front yard with the sewer system. That is all this is. Not one dollar need be spent. The people do not want this land taken; they want the engineering plan followed that we adopted. These gentlemen are all wrong when they say there is a lot of money involved in this. We supplied $11,000,000 a year extra for channel stabilization and river regulation and to shore up the banks to protect the levees from caving. This change that has been made is not necessary from an engineering standpoint, and merely makes the private people down there throw their land into the flood way without payment. It will just be like Mr. STAFFORD and Mr. FREAR throwing in their coats to help this economy program.

Mr. SCHAFER. What is the total approximate estimate of cost?

Mr. REID of Illinois. There should not be a dollar spent if the Army engineers will follow the plan they made and go around the point instead of cutting across with the levees.

Mr. SCHAFER. Make a provision to that effect.

Mr. REID of Illinois. You can not do it in this bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SNELL) there were—ayes 63, noes 87.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 136, nays 186, not voting 110, as follows:

PRIVATE CALENDAR

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, with Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BANKHEAD). The House is in Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar under clause 6 of Rule XXIV of the House.

The Clerk will call the first bill on the Private Calendar.

FRANKLIN D. CLARK

The Clerk called the first bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 927, for the relief of the estate of Franklin D. Clark.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I think it might be well, Mr. Chairman, for the distinguished Chairman of the committee to state, as this is the first bill to be considered under the new rule adopted by the House about six weeks ago, what the privileges of the Members are with regard to objecting, and in the consideration of the bills.

As I understand, a Member who is opposed to a bill may have the right to proceed for five minutes. Then the Member in favor of the bill may proceed for five minutes. Then the Chair is obliged to submit the question whether the bill shall be considered, and if three objections are made, it goes over. If not, it is given consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands the rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was originally called for consideration I asked the indulgence of the House for five minutes to read a decision found in Forty-fourth Federal, page 516, which upheld the right of the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Home to withdraw pension money, which the inmates have received from time to time, and transfer it to the post fund. I then stated that had it not been for the fact that during the six years I was out of Congress I had a most worthy case, on which occasion I looked up the law, I would not stand here and cite the law and register my opposition to a bill that has been introduced by my colleague the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

The case that came to my attention was a very meritorious case and the facts were similar to the case here. Congress established the policy that as far as pension money was concerned, where there is no widow or minor child living, the money may be transferred to the post fund; and if there is no widow or minor child living, then the estate will not have the right to get the fund. I have here a well-considered opinion upholding a former Member of the House, Judge Peters, in the United States district court, in which the respective laws of Congress are construed, and in which they uphold the right of the Congress.

I will only read very briefly, because I do not wish to take up more time than necessary. This is the most recent decision, rendered in 1930. I read:

The construction contended for by the Government in this case, and upheld in the court below, appears to be the only reasonable one. The intent of Congress, by which it is provided that every inmate of a home, on entering the home, enters into an agreement that all personal property he may possess at his death, in case he dies in the home, leaving no heirs at law or next of kin, and not disposed of by will, shall vest in the Board of Managers of the home for the benefit of the "post fund" of the home.

In this case there were two executors appointed. There was a will, where the property had been transferred over, and yet the circuit court of appeals upheld the decision of the lower court and held that that was the intent of Congress.

I was in this body when the law was passed as a rider on an appropriation bill. The law had as its basis the protection of the Government, and provided that if we are paying pension money to inmates of the home, it should have the right to withdraw it for the benefit of the post fund, and that it should not be diverted from the post fund unless a widow or minor children survived.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The decision the gentleman just read states, "unless the man leaves next of kin or a will."

This man left next of kin, a daughter, with several children; and he left a will. In that will he stipulated he wanted her to have the money for the benefit of the children, and he specifically provided that he did not want a certain son to have any of the money.

Does the gentleman mean to say he does not want the grandchildren of this man who left a will to have his money at his death? They are not friends; they are children of his daughter.

Mr. STAFFORD. I take the position that the Congress of the United States has established a policy in the enactment of a law, and it is not right to have a special law for one set of favorites and another law for others.

Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the chairman of the committee desire recognition?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, the author of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the gentleman from Missouri, the chairman of the committee, is entitled to recognition for five minutes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has read the decision handed down by the court in 1930.

The decision stated that where the soldier did not leave next of kin, or a will, the money was to revert to the home. If that were the case in this bill, there would be no use to take up the time of the committee arguing. This soldier accumulated over $1,000. I repeat he left a will, in which he provided that the money should go to the children of his daughter, whose husband, as I recall it, was sick and could not work.

The committee brought the governor of the soldiers' home to Washington and kept him here for two days, not only on this bill but in order to go into the entire question. At that hearing it was disclosed that money properly belonging to veterans and their heirs was being diverted to the post fund. The post fund is supposed to be used for the purpose of providing amusements, and so forth, for the inmates of the home. However, it was disclosed in the hearings that money in the post fund had even been used to buy fire apparatus.

We are considering a clean-cut case where a veteran of the Civil War wanted what he possessed left to the children of his daughter and specifically provided in the will that his son should receive none of it.

Mr. DALLINGER rose.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I reported this bill after a hearing before a subcommittee, and it was subsequently——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order the gentleman from Missouri can not yield any of this time to the gentleman from Massachusetts. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts; I do not yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to the floor. The gentleman from Missouri, in the opinion of the Chair, can yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts for a question or for a statement.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts to refresh my memory on what occurred in the subcommittee.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, our subcommittee found that the United States Code, section 136 of title 24, which gives the intention of Congress in regard to this matter, states that personal property owned by such applicant at the time of his death, including money and choses in action held by him and not disposed of by will, shall go to the home.

In this case the man left a will. It is perfectly evident that never did Congress intend that money which belonged to a man should not go to the people to whom he left it by his will.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I think the chairman of the subcommittee has properly presented this case to the committee.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is it not a fact that after holding extensive hearings and after Mr. Wood, the president of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, had testified, the subcommittee of the Expenditures Committee unanimously recommended favorable action on the bill and so reported to the full committee, and that then the full committee voted the bill out without a dissenting vote, after considering the facts brought to its attention by the subcommittee?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That is a fact. Further than that, the committee was to consider legislation amending this law.

Mr. SCHAFER. It was the opinion of the committee that the Board of Managers had specifically violated clear mandatory provisions of law written by Congress.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That was brought out not once but half a dozen times.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. This case and others like it are all based upon the technical consideration of the law by the comptroller without looking back either into the law under which he is acting or the preceding laws which were reenacted in the statute of 1910.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. To a certain extent that is true.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Three objections are required. The Chair hears but one objection. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair permit me to submit a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to state to the Chair that I think I inadvertently misled the Chair into the ruling made a moment ago. The rule, as the Chair will see, provides an initial 10 minutes of general debate, 5 minutes controlled by the Member offering the objection or reservation and 5 minutes controlled by the chairman of the committee reporting the bill or in his absence by any Member supporting the bill. I think the word "controlled" would grant to either the Member objecting or reserving the right to object, and to the chairman of the committee or the proponents of the bill the right to control five minutes' time. I would like to have a ruling by the Chair on that, as we are starting on this initial procedure.

The CHAIRMAN. Without very carefully examining the rule, the Chair is inclined to accept that interpretation.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Chairman, does that mean that the Member in control of the time may yield time to some other Member of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. He can yield for a statement or a question.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, may I follow that with another parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SWING. Frequently the chairman of the committee does not know the facts. There should be a liberal interpretation in order to get the facts before the committee. It seems to me the chairman should be permitted to yield to the Member who is the author of the bill, if he so desires.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from California will refresh his recollection about the rule, he will find that under the rule the control of the time is specifically given to the chairman of the committee, or, in his absence, to some Member who is in favor of the bill.

Mr. SWING. I think he ought to be permitted to yield time.

The CHAIRMAN. That question is not before the Chair at this time. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers is hereby directed to pay to the executor of the estate of Franklin D. Clark, late of Company F, Twenty-eighth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, Civil War, $1,468, which was the amount of undrawn pension in the hands of said Board of Managers at the time of the death of the veteran, and which amount was not paid to the executor of the estate as directed in said Franklin D. Clark's last will and testament dated May 19, 1922, but diverted into the post fund of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any opposition to the bill? If not, the Chair will recognize the chairman of the committee to make a motion that the bill be laid aside, to be reported back to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported back to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point a short brief upon the subject covered in this bill, and which gives the history of the statutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The brief is as follows:

This is H. R. 927, introduced by Mr. SCHAFER, for the relief of the estate of Franklin D. Clark. It is No. 1 on the Private Calendar. A Civil War veteran at the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers saved a part of his pension money and by will devised his saved pension, but upon request of the executor of his estate payment was refused by the Comptroller General of the United States.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has objected to this bill and cited in support of his position Durack v. National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers (44 Fed. (2d), 516), which is a decision by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals of the First Circuit of a Maine decision.

The decision refers to the statutes of 1881, 1882, 1902, 1910, and 1912 and supports the action of the home in refusing to pay money to an executor, but that case does not show that the soldier willed any part of the money to any person, as appears here.

The act of 1881, as amended in 1882 and 1912, provided for disposition of the balance of pension money on discharge of veteran in express words. The act of 1881 and its amendment in 1882 designated the disposition of funds in case of death of veteran, and included "legal representatives" in the classification of those who were rightful beneficiaries.

By act of 1902 the class was limited to widow, minor children, or dependent mother or father, in order named.

The act of 1910 did not change the previous statutes, but prescribed the contract to be entered into with a veteran and provided that all personal property owned and held by the veteran at the time of his death, "and not disposed of by will, whether such property be the proceeds of pensions or otherwise derived" should pass to the post fund of the home. I emphasize—only the money not disposed of by will might go to the home. As a matter of construction and good faith, note that by the contract required by statute to be made, there is expressly reserved and saved to the veteran the right to dispose of his personal property by will, including money saved from his pension.

This right has not been the subject of any legislation since 1910.

In 1912 a statute amended some details of the then existing statute in regard to the payment of pensions and forgery of indorsements upon pension checks, and contained a saving clause stating that it should not "be construed as amending or repealing" the statute of 1882. No reference was made to the statute of 1902 limiting the class to "widow, minor children, or dependent mother or father."

Now, what is the necessary and logical conclusion? Whatever reasons may be advanced for the passage of the act of 1910, it is clear that in the next session of Congress it was intended to give full faith and credit to the statute of 1882 and to declare what property rights might be the subject of the contract by which the right of the veteran to enter the home was defined.

One of those rights was to dispose of his unused pension by will. Of what benefit is the right if the exercise of it is denied? Are the words to be entirely disregarded because the next Congress expressly saves the law as it was prior to 1910 and 1902 and leaves in existence the old laws of 1881 and 1882 as incorporated therein?

I submit that the conclusion must be that when the statute of 1912 prescribed only the manner of payment of the pension money and provided punishment for forgery of a pension check, its words and saving clause should not be perverted to cover the disposition of the money after it had been deposited in the home by or on behalf of the veteran, and that his statutory contractual right should be respected.

Therefore, if the veteran did dispose of his pension savings and other personal property by will, his testamentary disposition is to be respected as to any property willed to a named legatee, and no ruling of the Comptroller General should interfere therewith.

Under the circumstances shown in the report of this bill, Congress should pass this relief bill to order payment of the money to the executor for delivery to the legatee named in the will.

I suggest that the committee reporting this bill have drafted a new statute expressly repealing all of the old ones hereinabove referred to, saving any and all rights accrued thereunder, and either make the new statute conform with the 1910 statute or else amend the latter so that no more similar disputes may arise.

WILLIE LOUISE JOHNSON

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 799, to extend the benefits of the employees' compensation act of September 7, 1916, to Willie Louise Johnson.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, do I understand the gentleman objects?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the gentleman from Wisconsin is entitled to recognition for five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not get much support when the former bill was under consideration, but I was consistent in my position. I had taken that same position when the bill was first considered. I gave the committee the benefit of the study I had made of the matter and I did not receive much support. So I do not know whether my position in respect to this bill will have any support.

Mr. Chairman, this bill, according to the report of this Congress, as well as the last Congress, shows that this claim was submitted to the United States Employees' Compensation Commission and that commission turned it down.

I may say right here I do not intend to go through with this seemingly wasteful effort in trying to protect the Treasury if I am not to receive some support. The Treasury means no more to me than it does to you. I am frank in my position. I am not trying to take up any time unnecessarily. I have gone over this report and I am going to state my position. I am not seeking to prevent any person getting his just deserts.

Now, what do the facts show? Here is a claim that was presented in due season immediately after the accident. The man was employed in the navy yard and had a slight abrasion or contusion on the head. The Employees' Compensation Commission found that this accident did not cause the death of this man and turned the claim down. Now, this bill provides "It is hereby authorized and directed," which is a mandatory provision against the position taken by the Employees' Compensation Commission, that this injury did not result in this man's death, but did result in his death.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I simply want to find out "where we are at." There are 809 bills on this calendar, some of them involving several hundred thousand dollars. Under the new rule if a Member can not get up here and in five minutes convince his colleagues that the bill ought not to be passed the measure passes ipso facto. Is not that the situation?

Mr. STAFFORD. Surely.

Mr. BLANTON. Where will that lead?

Mr. STAFFORD. It will lead to hundreds of thousands of dollars being drained out of the Federal Treasury, and this was the position I took in opposing this rule before the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BLANTON. It will mean governmental bankruptcy practically. That is what it is going to mean. And we must organize and stop these bad bills from passing.

Mr. STAFFORD. I took that position, as I have stated, before the Committee on Rules and stated that the Democratic majority of the House in these times could not afford to adopt such a policy. We are trying it out now.

Here is the statement of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy on this bill:

> In drilling holes in a tank the motor hung, causing him to fall and strike his face against the edge of the tank, causing a contusion of the right side of the face. He was attended by the medical officer of the yard, but was not incapacitated as the result of this injury nor did he lose any time on account thereof.

I submit the matter to you. I have done my duty and I am not going to take up any further time.

I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LANKFORD].

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that this is the case in which I gave him the report of the coroner's inquest.

It was not the blow on the head that caused his death. Here was a man who had been working for 20 years and had not missed a day for over a year. The machine struck him over the kidneys, and within four or five days after this blow the man died.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have fallen in sawing off limbs of trees and have fallen on my head, and I have never made any claim against anybody.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Within four or five days after this accident this perfectly healthy man died. The doctor made a wrong diagnosis in the case.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, there are more than three objectors here; why take up any more time with this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that we have not reached that stage in the procedure.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I hate to take up the time of the committee unnecessarily, but I am thoroughly convinced of the justice of this case. Here was a perfectly healthy man, who had worked for 20 years and had not missed a day in the last year. He received this blow in the side and died in four days. The naval surgeon who attended him said he had hysteria within a few hours of the time of his death. They also called in a private physician, who properly diagnosed his trouble, but the man died in the greatest agony. He has left a widow who is practically penniless and helpless. This is a case where the United States Compensation Board turned the claim down on the basis of the diagnosis of the naval doctor, which I submit was a mistake.

The blow which this man received was over the kidneys, and that is what killed him.

I wanted to give the committee the facts, and these are the facts in the case.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. PATTERSON, Mr. BLANTON, Mr. STAFFORD, and Mr. GRISWOLD objected, and the bill was referred to the deferred list.

HOWARD LEWTER

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 808, to extend the benefits of the employees' compensation act of September 7, 1916, to Howard Lewter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, to-day a procedure is being inaugurated radically different from that under prior calls of this Private Calendar. I might say to those who have not attended night sessions that it has been the rule of those who have been charged with scrutinizing the Private Calendar not to extend the privileges of the compensation act, which was passed in September, 1916, to any injury that occurred prior to that date. This bill seeks to extend the compensation act of 1916 back to an injury happening in 1913. It would be quite a heavy burden if we opened up the Treasury to claims of all kinds for injuries that happened prior to 1916, as this bill proposes.

There was an act in force prior to 1916, which granted a year's compensation to all who received injuries in the Government service.

Now, I think that mere presentation shows that it would be unwise policy to open up the gates of the Treasury to injuries that occurred prior to 1916.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. MOUSER. There are a number of cases where injuries occurred prior to 1916, where claims would be made if this bill establishes such a precedent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; there are hundreds of them.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. This is a typical case, where the claimant was entitled to compensation under the old law, but payment was completed before the compensation law of 1916 went into effect. Now, 16 years after the compensation law went into effect, he comes in and wants to be reinstated, and asks for full compensation for the intervening 16 years and from now on.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not only that, but he asks us to establish a policy of allowing compensation beyond 1916.

Mr. BLANTON. And the department says that the bill if enacted would give the claimant greater compensation than was allowed by the legislation in force at the time of the injury.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the objectors seem to be adopting a policy for the entire House. As we all know, three Members can stop the passage of one of these bills. I believe it is very important to get more information as to the interpretation of the rule that we are working under.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me say that I stated the policy that we were working under, those of us who are charged with the duty of scrutinizing these bills.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Well, the whole House is charged with that, if it does its duty.

Mr. STAFFORD. That same observation applies to those unconscionable claims that are reported from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Let me ask the gentleman——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further. The gentleman can make a statement in his own time. Mr. Chairman, I merely stated what I thought should be the policy, and it rests with the House to determine whether we should follow that policy or not. If we are going to adopt a policy that every person injured prior to the compensation act of 1916 is to be entitled to the benefits of that act, let us be fair and pass general legislation, and not favor this one or that one under political favoritism.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, if I have a right to yield the time, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LANKFORD].

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I want to explain the reasons for filing this claim. This boy is the son of an old colored woman, almost 80 years of age. He is a cripple, he is on crutches, and can not walk without the crutches and a cane. He has been in that condition for 16 years. It seemed to me that if there ever was a case which deserved consideration of the Government it is this case. He was climbing up an electric pole in the navy yard and was shocked. He fell; and he will be in that condition all of his life, with this old colored woman his only support, and she is between 70 and 80 years of age. She can hardly walk. If you are going to adopt the rule that you will not go back of any of them, I have nothing to say. This is a pathetic case, and I felt justified in asking the consideration of Congress for it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MOUSER, Mr. EATON of Colorado, Mr. STAFFORD, and Mr. BLANTON objected, and the bill was referred to the deferred list.

MORRIS DIETRICH

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1034) for the relief of Morris Dietrich.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the sponsor of the bill or the chairman of the committee has a right to explain its provisions.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I quote from the rule:

When the Clerk shall have read the bill the same shall be considered unless objection or reservation of objection is made to immediate consideration. Should objection or reservation of objection be made there shall be 10 minutes' general debate to be divided, 5 minutes controlled by the Member offering the objection or reservation, and 5 minutes controlled by the chairman of the committee reporting the bill, or in his absence by any Member supporting the bill. If, after such debate, three objections are not forthcoming the bill shall be considered under the 5-minute rule: Provided, however, That the total debate under the 5-minute rule shall not exceed 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is familiar with the rule. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. PATTERSON. The point of order is that three objections will cut off debate.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the construction of the rule by the Chair. A careful reading of the rule it seems to the Chair would lead to the fair construction that, although the objection of three Members will prevent the consideration of the bill and send it to the deferred list, at least the spirit and even the letter of the rule provides that opportunity be given to those who desire to explain the bill and for those making the reservation of objection to be heard. In the opinion of the Chair that is a right conferred upon the members of the committee, and the Chair overrules the point of order. In the opinion of the Chair the reason for that construction is that if a reasonable opportunity be given to debate the merits of the bill it might remove possible objection to its consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, instead of criticizing the Members of the House who are spending so much of their time investigating these bills, I commend them. I know it requires a great deal of time and effort to properly prepare themselves to present their objections to the House. They have to read the reports of committees and they have to get information from the different departments. They have to spend considerable time and go to lots of trouble that otherwise they would not have to do. I have not been spending any time on these private bills because I have not had the time, and I was perfectly willing to accept the judgment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and the judgment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and other Members of the House who have been giving these private bills considerable attention and study. I think the old rule is a better rule than this one.

I want to invite attention to criticisms that have been urged against Members of the House of Representatives that I do not think should be urged. I have before me a statement that is being published all over the country against Members of the House of Representatives. It is untrue. It is unwarranted. The facts do not justify it at all.

It is as follows:

Not many of us ever thought that we were furnishing Congressmen and Senators free eating in the congressional café, but we are. We doubt if any of us ever thought we furnished a most elegant barber shop in the Capitol Building, where our lawmakers, between their speeches on economy, can have hair cuts and shaves, shampoos, hair and whiskers dyed, blackheads extracted from the noble noses of the solons, and shoes shined, all free; but we do.

Did you know we pay for a free shaving mug for every one of these Representatives and Senators and that we pay $36 a dozen for golf balls for them to play with?

The above statement appeared in the Marshall Morning News, Marshall, Tex., under the heading Public Office a Private Snap, and has been reprinted in other newspapers. It is an amazing statement. I am unwilling to be put in the attitude of condoning such outrageous conduct. There is a café in the House wing of the Capitol. It is a great convenience to the Members. It is quite a distance from the Capitol to the nearest point where a café could be located on private property. Congress meets at 12 o'clock noon. Members usually attend committee meetings until the House meets. By getting their noonday meals at the Capitol they are near by in the event of a vote or other important proceedings. The café does not render free service. The price charged is higher than any café I have ever visited in Washington. It is necessary to charge high prices so as to make it self-sustaining, since there is only one meal served each day. A barber shop is also maintained in the Capitol for the convenience of the Members of the House of Representatives. The price of a shave is 25 cents. The price in most of the shops in Washington is 20 cents. Hair cuts are 60 cents. The price in most of the shops in Washington is 40 cents and none over 50 cents. Shoe shines are 10 cents, the customary price. I have not received any of the other services mentioned in the newspaper item; but my information is that every service is charged for and no Member of the House of Representatives receives free service in a barber shop but pays a higher price than is charged in other shops in the city. No Member of the House has a shaving mug furnished to him free, neither is he furnished golf balls.

MOTHER-IN-LAW ON PAY ROLL

The item states further:

And not only this but it appears that the great majority of these servants (?) of ours have their relatives on the Government pay rolls, wives, sons, daughters, nephews, nieces, mothers-in-law, brothers-in-laws, and all kinds of in-laws.

I can not speak for other Members. I do know that I have never placed a relative on my pay roll. I have a secretary and an assistant secretary who earn their salaries, and who are paid by the Government. It is often necessary to have an additional employee in my office, and to have considerable stenographic and clerical work done by others. When this is necessary, it is done without expense to the Government, and without deductions from the salary of either of my employees.

CONDUCT OF A PUBLIC OFFICIAL

I have always maintained that a public office is a public trust; that an officeholder should so conduct the people's business that no criticism of his official conduct would be corroborated by unexplained facts. We should not do things that are all right, but have to be explained; and certainly it is wrong for an officeholder to do something secretly that he would not do publicly. Much has been said about the pay rolls of the Members being secret. I made a speech in the House May 9, 1932, in which I denounced the policy of expending public funds secretly. All public funds should be expended subject to public inspection. To-day a resolution was passed permitting public inspection of all current expenditures of the House of Representatives. A law should be passed making all income-tax returns subject to public inspection. Tax money is collected and refunded in secret. All expenditures of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation should be subject to public inspection. Secrecy is a badge of fraud. When the tax bill was before the House I endeavored to secure the passage of an amendment making all tax returns and refunds subject to public inspection; the amendment lost. I hope such an amendment is put on in the Senate.

As a member of the Legislature of Texas for four years, and as district attorney of the fifth judicial district of Texas for five years, and as a Member of Congress for three years, it has been my policy not to accept free services of any kind—not even tickets to theaters or passes on railroads or busses. I have tried to refrain from placing myself in a position that might make it the least embarrassing for me to do my full duty in compliance with my oath of office.

CONGRESSMEN SUBJECT TO INCOME TAX LAWS

The report is being circulated that Members of Congress do not have to pay income taxes on their salaries. This is untrue. They pay income taxes the same as other people. Members of Congress have also voted at this session a reduction in their own salaries and voted to increase the income-tax rate on their incomes. In addition, a reduction has been voted for mileage and stationery allowance. Some people seem to think that if Congressmen would reduce their own salaries 50 per cent the deficit would be overcome. If Congressmen did not draw salaries for one year it would save the income-tax payer 15 cents on every $100 payment; if reduced 50 per cent, it would save 7½ cents on every $100 collected from income-tax payers.

DEAR DOLLARS AND CHEAP COMMODITIES OUR PRINCIPAL TROUBLE

The people have a right to complain about high taxes. However, it is not the increased governmental expenditures that is the whole cause of the trouble. It is the increased purchasing power of the dollar that has doubled taxes. A few greedy bondholders and other selfish interests that have charge of the financial system of the Government have caused a contraction of credit and the slowing up of the velocity of money and credits until every dollar is worth from two to four dollars measured in the commodities that our debts are paid in on the basis of the value of the dollar at the time most of the debts were contracted.

A correction of the money system will correct practically if not all our economic troubles.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BANKHEAD). If the gentleman will allow the Chair to make a statement, I think the Chair may anticipate what the gentleman has in mind.

A question has been raised, and upon it the present occupant of the chair rendered an opinion which, upon reflection and reconsideration, the Chair now believes was erroneous and improper.

A question was raised whether or not a proper construction of the rule did not provide that if there were instantly three objections to the consideration of a bill that would carry it over to the "deferred list," without the privilege of occupying the 10 minutes of debate.

In the opinion of the Chair, in reflecting upon the discussions upon the adoption of the rule before the Committee on Rules, and by a very careful reading of the proviso in the rule, the Chair is clearly of the opinion that the somewhat hasty decision reached a few moments ago is in error, and the Chair is now of the opinion that if a bill is called and three members of the committee rise and object to its consideration that automatically carries it to the "deferred list."

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is not the way the rule reads, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that that is the proper construction of the rule.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I thought the reservation of objection was to give a Member a chance to explain his bill so that the House could know what the bill was before the time came for objection; and certainly the rule reads that way.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUSBY. The rule further states that on reservation of objection the person making the reservation has the right to control five minutes of time allotted. Does the Chair construe the word "control" as requiring the one who makes the reservation of objection to actually use that time himself, or to control it in the sense that that term is usually used when a certain amount of time is allotted that may be reallotted by the person controlling the time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled upon that proposition. The ruling may be in error, but the Chair is convinced that the rule itself anticipated that the gentleman being recognized should control the time, five minutes, if he desired, and that he should not parcel it out by one minute or two minutes or one-half minute.

Mr. BUSBY. And that in order to control it he must use it himself?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON, Mr. STAFFORD, and Mr. EATON of Colorado objected, and the bill was referred to the deferred list.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. When a gentleman objects to a bill, the rule provides that then there shall be 10 minutes' debate on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule does not provide for five minutes' debate if three objections are made. It is immediately carried to the deferred list.

Mr. FRENCH. Would the Chair hear me upon that particular construction?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. FRENCH. It seems to me that the effect of the three objections made would be to leave discussion for five minutes on each side, and then if the three objections are persisted in, the bill would pass to the deferred list. On the other hand, if three objections are not had at the expiration of the 10 minutes, then further discussion would be had to the extent of 20 minutes. It seems to me that that is the meaning of the rule. The purpose of the 5-minute discussion on a side is to determine whether or not the objections or reservations may be withdrawn. It will be noted also that this 10-minute discussion is not included as part of the 20 minutes under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, if that is not the meaning of the rule, then what does the rule mean when it provides there be 10 minutes general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. It reads:

After the debate hereinbefore referred to, or when the bill is first called, if objection is made by three Members to the consideration of the bill, then the same shall be passed over and carried to a list designated as "deferred."

ESTATE OF KATHERINE HEINRICH

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1130, a bill for the relief of the estate of Katherine Heinrich (Charles Grieser and others, executors).

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. Chairman, I dislike to raise an objection to a measure introduced by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] who is a very conscientious legislator, but in this instance it is quite apparent the executor of the estate, the claimant for relief because of an excessive amount paid by virtue of the Federal estate tax, slept on his rights and was guilty of laches.

Under the law it was necessary to file within a period of four years an application for refund of excessive payments growing out of Federal estate taxes. In this instance the executors, through their attorneys, are supposed to have mailed a claim for refund to the internal revenue collector in Idaho. The letter was not sent by registered mail, or by special delivery, but by ordinary mail. There apparently was no inquiry addressed to the Internal Revenue Department of the Treasury within a period of four years. Finally, about a month after the expiration of this time, a second application was filed and received.

It seems to me the claimant has clearly slept upon his rights, and that it is a bad precedent to permit a refund of this nature under the facts as reported by the committee. Therefore, at the proper time I shall be compelled to enter my objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill provides for the refund of $494.84 to the estate of the late Katherine Heinrich (Charles Grieser and others, executors), Genesee, Idaho, on account of an overpayment in this amount of Federal estate tax. The tax was paid November 10, 1921. The gentleman from Ohio has stated briefly the situation with this exception, that application for refund was made within a period of four years provided by law. In this particular case application for refund would need to have been made prior to November 10, 1925. As a matter of fact, application was made through the attorney for the claimants on March 6, 1923, or two and one-half years within the time fixed by law. The gentleman stated correctly that the application was not inclosed in a registered letter or sent by special delivery mail. It was mailed as ordinary mail. I have furnished the committee an affidavit of the lawyer, Mr. C. J. Orland, of Moscow, Idaho, who represented the executors to the effect that the executors did make the application and that they executed the application on forms or blanks furnished and that he found within his files a carbon copy of his letter of transmittal addressed "Collector's Office, Boise, Idaho," and dated March 6, 1923, and that to his best remembrance and belief he deposited said letter and application for refund in the post office at Moscow, Idaho.

Mr. Grieser, one of the executors, called repeatedly upon the attorney in the case, Mr. Orland, and reminded him of the fact that application had been made and that nothing had been heard from the Internal Revenue Bureau. However, Mr. Orland, accustomed as he was to delay in the department in acknowledgment of letters and refund of money, assured the executor that the fact that there was delay meant nothing other than the normal delay incident to matters of this kind.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FRENCH. I yield.

Mr. MOUSER. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman's explanation, but the attorney did not write to the Internal Revenue Department to secure information as to the progress of the claim in behalf of his client. Is not that correct?

Mr. FRENCH. That is true; and I think he should have done it. On the other hand, he was going upon experience he had had during many years of practice, and was recognizing the delays that occur in matters of this kind in dealing with different departments of the Government. Mr. Orland is one of the ablest and most careful of lawyers.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I yield.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Is not this a case where the Government has the money and the executors had to make the effort to get their money back?

Mr. FRENCH. That is true; the Government has the money. If any Member here were in the place of the Government, he would not go to bed to-night before refunding the money to Mr. Grieser.

The fact of the matter is, the executors did not know they had overpaid until the department notified them. They then made application very shortly.

Finally, as the gentleman from Ohio has said, after the four years were up and they had heard nothing of their application they tried to find what had become of it, and found it had never been received by the collector's office. Immediately application was renewed and that application is the one the department states came too late.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, the executors did everything they were in duty bound to do. They did make the application within the proper time. There was no laches upon their part.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. They had the right to come in and make their claim just the same as any other claimant?

Mr. FRENCH. And they did.

Mr. BLANTON. If they have exhausted their legal rights, why should they ask Congress to respond?

Mr. FRENCH. They did make the application within the proper time.

Mr. BLANTON. But they were turned down.

Mr. FRENCH. No; no. The application failed because the Post Office Department in some way failed to deliver the letter.

Mr. BLANTON. But the estate had an attorney, and the attorney should have looked after it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON, Mr. MOUSER, and Mr. PATTERSON objected, and the bill was referred to the deferred list.

A. L. HEDDING

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1350, for the relief of A. L. Hedding.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, this is a bill to which I have already objected. The evidence in it is such evidence that could not be collected upon in any court of law. It attempts to collect damages for injury to a truck by a Government automobile, the claim being that the automobile was going uphill and had no lights on it when, as a matter of fact, according to the report, it was not required, under the law of California, to burn lights at that hour, the accident having happened at 5.41. I object to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado, Mr. BLANTON, and Mr. GRISWOLD objected, and the bill was referred to the deferred list.

BRUCE BROS. GRAIN CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1525, for the relief of Bruce Bros. Grain Co.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, in regard to the criticism against Members of Congress, I want to invite again your attention to the criticism from which I read a few minutes ago. The charge was made:

> Not many of us ever thought that we were furnishing Congressmen and Senators free eating in the Congressional Café but we are.

I do not claim to know anything about the other side of this Capitol, that is, the Senate of the United States. I do not know whether that charge is true as to the Senate or not, but I do know it is not true as to the House of Representatives. I have never received a free meal at this House restaurant and I do not believe any other Member of the House of Representatives has ever received a free meal. You pay the same price there, and more, than you pay down town or at any other restaurant in the city.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. MOUSER. As a matter of fact, the House restaurant is self-sustaining because of the money paid by Members for their meals and in entertaining their visitors.

Mr. PATMAN. I thank the gentleman for that contribution.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Eight or 10 years ago the House restaurant did cost the Government $50,000 or $60,000 annually and put the Treasury in the hole every year, but that has been corrected. The House caused that situation to be overhauled. Our friend from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] is now in charge of it; he is putting some business into it, and he is trying to get that institution on a business basis. And all of us must back him up 100 per cent. I think the criticism probably comes because of conditions that existed years ago.

Mr. PATMAN. Let me again invite your attention to this. It says:

> We doubt if any of us ever thought we furnished a most elegant barber shop in the Capitol Building where our lawmakers, between their speeches on economy, can have hair cuts and shaves, shampoos, hair and whiskers dyed, blackheads extracted from the noble noses of the solons, and shoes shined, all free, but we do.

Mr. BLANTON. That too, if my colleagues will permit, is absolutely untrue as to the situation at the present time, for as he correctly stated, we pay now full price for shaves, haircuts, shampoos, and massages. But some years ago there was a large sum of money spent each year by the Government on the House barber shops, with salaries paid, and other expenses that were subject to criticism, but the House of Representatives has long since stopped such abuses, and, as the gentleman said, there is not a word of truth in said newspaper criticism so far as the House of Representatives now is concerned.

Mr. PATMAN. There is not a word of truth in that as far as the House of Representatives is concerned. I do not claim to know anything about the other body. It says that each Representative is furnished with a free shaving mug. If there is a free shaving mug furnished to any Member of the House of Representatives, I do not know anything about it. I have not been in the barber shop very much, but I do not think a free shaving mug is furnished to the Members.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Why not state that there is not a shaving mug in the barber shop?

Mr. PATMAN. I have never seen one there.

Mr. LINTHICUM. They are not sanitary anyhow and nobody uses shaving mugs any more.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman state where that paper is published?

Mr. PATMAN. The Marshall Morning News, of Marshall, Tex., published the statement.

Mr. DIES. In view of the fact that this paper is published in my district, I am sure they must have been misinformed. I want the gentleman to write the paper and see if the editor is fair enough to correct this statement

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON and Mr. EATON of Colorado objected.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a point of order against objections being offered at this time. Reservations of objection have been made, and the Member making them has then proceeded to talk for five minutes about restaurants, barber shops, and golf balls.

Immediately when he is through three other Members get up and object to the bill, and the committee and the author of the bill are barred from any discussion.

I make a point of order against objections being made after the five minutes of time are exhausted. They should be made either before or after that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado, Mr. BLANTON, and Mr. STAFFORD objected.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard. The rule provides for five minutes in favor of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not apprised of the fact the gentleman desired recognition. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the gentleman who introduced this bill, who was just called from the hall, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] what are his objections to the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will give me 10 minutes to explain my reasons, I can convince the gentleman himself that he ought not to vote for this bill as a matter of sound Government policy, but in a few seconds of time no man on earth could state his reasons.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I have read the report. This bill provides for an appropriation of $279.90 to correct a mistake made by an agency of the Government. We have a statement here from the then Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace, and I may say that the gentleman from Texas always looks at the report and tells the committee what the department states. Why not in this case? Mr. Wallace said:

> It would seem that the second appeal grade certificate was issued without regard to the regulations and under the circumstances should not have been issued at the late date of July 23. This was the first case of this kind which arose in the administration of the act and as soon as the matter was brought to our attention, steps were immediately taken to prevent a recurrence of the situation.

It is evident it was a mistake of the Government and it cost a private corporation $279.90.

I do not think the gentleman from Texas is in possession of the facts, because if he were, the gentleman could explain in less than 10 minutes. It is my opinion the gentleman should withdraw his objection. I can not agree with the gentleman that as a matter of sound Government policy the bill should not be passed. It appears to me to merit favorable consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MOUSER, Mr. EATON of Colorado, and Mr. BLANTON objected, and the bill was referred to the deferred list.

THOMAS H. DEAL

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1928, for the relief of Thomas H. Deal.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

I believe the members of the committee will be very much interested to know that the Common Council of Detroit on day before yesterday indorsed the bill H. R. 11499, passed by the House on May 2 last by a vote of 289 to 60, "to restore and maintain the purchasing power of the dollar"; also that the Board of Aldermen of Chicago passed a resolution day before yesterday requesting the Congress of the United States to pass legislation to raise the wholesale commodity price level to the 1926 level.

I would like to refer the members of the committee to an article in the Bulletin of the National City Bank, the second largest bank in the United States, of May, 1932, in which the statement is made:

> Able economists have maintained for years that the central banks of the world possessed the requisite organization and power, acting in cooperation, to stabilize the state of credit and the general price level to such an extent as to prevent the wide fluctuations which result in panic and disorder.

I am reading this in connection with the widespread criticism of an uninformed press.

I also desire to call the committee's attention to an article in a very conservative financial weekly, Barron's, of April 25. It is the leading article, under the title "Will the Gold Standard Survive?" I read a short extract from this article:

With little foresight we have contracted to use this unrelated variable (referring to gold) for the repayment of all our mortgages and the fulfillment of all our contracts, and even for the taxes on the land itself. In the case of all mortgages we have, therefore, imposed upon our farms, our land, our railways, and our homes, which are the true constants, a promise to pay in terms of a variable. The result can be, and now is, disastrous. For the equity of a property—the value over and above the mortgage—fluctuates with multiplied violence, and the change in value of the equity is not imaginary but real.

I think it would be worth the while of every Member of Congress to read this article, which covers two or three pages of Barron's.

In the New York Herald Tribune of May 15 is an article dated London, May 14. I quote:

This position has produced in Britain, as well as in America, a growing demand for remedial action by the Government. Prices, it is declared, can be raised through appropriate monetary measures, and it is Government duty to adopt such measures with the least possible delay.

The debate in the House of Commons on the financial bill this week became almost a demonstration in favor of controlled inflation. Two former chancellors of the exchequer, Sir Robert Horne and Winston Churchill, led the way, and their pleas were echoed by members of all parties. Outside of political circles similar, if slightly more moderate, arguments have recently been published in a monthly review of the Midland Bank and in the Economist, among the most responsible and most conservative of financial reviews in the country.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ARENTZ. Assuming that it is necessary to discuss the merits of this bill, and that such discussion be had on the termination of the five minutes by those opposed to the bill, how is it possible for the proponents to present their arguments?

The CHAIRMAN. Any Member can make a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. So as to get the position of the opponents of this bill before the committee let me say that the department held that there was no proof whatever of any burglary, and therefore we ought to defeat this bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I want to serve notice on the House that when gentlemen object or reserve an objection to a bill, they must confine their remarks to the bill. I do that in the interest of the committee, so that gentlemen who are entitled to state their objections may do so, and those entitled to respond may get time, and we can hear both sides.

Mr. ARENTZ. Does the gentleman intend to state the position of the proponents of this bill?

Mr. BLACK. This is a bill for the relief of a postmaster in Alaska. He wants a refund from the Government, because of a robbery, where certain Government property was stolen from a post-office safe. I think the Government treated the postmaster in a very harsh fashion. In the first place, the inspectors accused the man of participation in the crime. They charged him with robbing his own safe. That was never substantiated. The postmaster had his own bonds in the safe with the Government property. His bonds were taken with the other property.

The inspectors also said the postmaster was negligent, because he kept the combination in the drawer, and took it out in the daytime and opened the safe.

I do not think that is anything; the man might have had a bad memory, and he had to have the combination in an accessible place. I think the Congress ought to see that this man gets his money.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. MOUSER. Does not the gentleman think that the postmaster was responsible for keeping the post-office receipts in his safe at Fairbanks, one of the largest towns in Alaska? Did he not owe a duty to place the Government securities in a bank or in a safety-deposit box?

Mr. BLACK. Human nature is a selfish proposition. I think any man in the Government service who takes the same care of the Government's receipts as he does of his own property can not be charged with negligence in his responsibilities toward the Government. This man did that.

Mr. MOUSER. We can not afford to encourage negligence on the part of postmasters in the handling of Government funds. He might just as well have put the money and bonds in the drawer of his desk.

Mr. BLACK. He put them in a safe.

Mr. BLANTON. He might just as well have put them in the cuspidor. There are entirely too many postmasters over the country having burglaries, which, when investigated by the department, show that such postmasters were at least negligent, and should be held responsible. Postmasters over the United States must understand that they are the custodians of Government property, and that they must carefully guard it just as they would their own, and when they have losses that could have been avoided, they are going to be held responsible.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MOUSER, Mr. BLANTON, and Mr. STAFFORD objected, and the bill was referred to the deferred list.

NOBLE JAY HALL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1962) for the relief of Noble Jay Hall.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. I trust there will be no point of order made, for I shall take just a moment. I am particularly interested in the unemployment program as advanced by the Speaker.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the bill.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a short bill introduced by myself on the unemployment situation in so far as the public-building construction is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman should make that request in the House.

Mr. GREEN. I shall make that request later, and shall not object to the bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, other gentlemen were on their feet ready to object, and I think the Chair should ask whether there is objection to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Two objections are made. Three are required. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $350 in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States to Noble Jay Hall, father of Bille Eugene Hall, who died as a result of injuries received in the laundry at Vancouver Barracks, Wash., July 26, 1928.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I was one of two Members to object to the consideration of this bill. The amount involved is rather small, but it involves a principle. I think the father of the child was more negligent than the Government, in view of the fact that the father neglected taking care of this minor child in his custody and allowed it to go on premises that were dangerous. I rise to register my objection so that the bill will not be used as a precedent in the future. No one wishes to raise objections at length to bills for small amounts, but there is no question that this bill is simply taking money out of the Treasury without justification.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

FRANK W. CHILDRESS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2595) for the relief of Frank W. Childress.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. PATTERSON, Mr. MOUSER, Mr. BLANTON, and Mr. EATON of Colorado objected, and the bill was referred to the deferred list.

EDWARD CHRISTIANSON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2606) for the relief of Edward Christianson.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. This bill was inadvertently objected to by a Member before he really appreciated the policy which was being followed—that in cases of injuries that occurred subsequent to the date of the compensation act, September 7, 1916, where the claimant was unaware of the law and was barred by the statute of limitations in that he had not presented his claim within one year he should be entitled to present his claim before the Compensation Commission. I told the author of the bill that I should have no objection to a substitute, which I shall propose, with the provision that no benefit shall accrue until the date of the enactment of the act, and also to a provision that the commission be empowered to investigate whether he is really entitled to the relief.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is familiar with the fact that the Department of Commerce reports that it has no record of Edward Christianson having been poisoned by impure water during his employment on lightship No. 77, and that under the circumstances the approval of the bill would not appear to be warranted.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is the substitute which I shall offer and which I hope will be accepted by my colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHNEIDER]:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized to consider and determine the claim of Edward Christianson, a civilian employee of the United States Coast Guard, who claims to have been poisoned by impure water drunk while serving aboard the Peshtigo lightship No. 77, at Peshtigo, Wis., on or about December 15, 1919, in the same manner and to the same extent as if said Edward Christianson had made application for the benefits of said act within the 1-year period required by sections 17 and 20 thereof: Provided, That no benefit shall accrue prior to the enactment of this act."

Mr. BLANTON. If that is accepted, there could be no objection.

Mr. MOUSER. Is there any evidence that any other man on the ship was poisoned by this drinking water at the same time?

Mr. STAFFORD. The substitute proposes for the Compensation Commission to determine that question. He claims he was. We are not making any legislative determination of that.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. There was no test made as to whether or not the water that was consumed by Christianson was poison, as far as the Government was concerned. When he became ill he was taken off the boat and taken away from the light boat; but the doctors who treated him on several occasions and for several years all contended that it could come from nothing else other than water, from which such disease would come.

Mr. MOUSER. What kind of poison? Typhoid fever?

Mr. SCHNEIDER. No. It was not typhoid. It was a peculiar skin disease.

Mr. MOUSER. The compensation commission can make a proper investigation under the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]?

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Yes.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I did not hear the gentleman from Wisconsin read a provision in the proposed amendment providing that no benefit should accrue prior to the approval of this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. That is included in the substitute also.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 17 and 20 of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, as amended, are hereby waived in favor of Edward Christianson, a civilian employee of the United States Coast Guard, who was poisoned by impure water drank while serving aboard the Peshtigo lightship, No. 77, at Peshtigo, Wis., on or about December 15, 1919, and his case is hereby authorized to be considered and acted upon under the remaining provisions of such act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: "That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized to consider and determine the claim of Edward Christianson, a civilian employee of the United States Coast Guard, who claims to have been poisoned by impure water drunk while serving aboard the Peshtigo lightship, No. 77, at Peshtigo, Wis., on or about December 15, 1919, in the same manner and to the same extent as if said Edward Christianson had made application for the benefits of said act within the 1-year period required by sections 17 and 20 thereof: Provided, That no benefit shall accrue prior to the enactment of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

ELIZABETH T. CLOUD

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 3030, for the relief of Elizabeth T. Cloud.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MOUSER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word in favor of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not entitled to recognition in favor of the bill.

Mr. MOUSER. I would like to explain the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the report shows that this claimant slipped and fell on the steps leading to the lobby of the post-office building at Atlantic City. There is nothing in the report to show that there was any negligence whatsoever on the part of the Government as to the condition of those premises. It is so easy for a person to slip on granite or marble steps. There are several other bills on the calendar of like import. Certainly, the Government can not, because a woman slipped, perchance because her heels may have been a little uneven, and suffered some injury, be called upon to compensate her.

It is for these reasons that I intend to object.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I yield my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOUSER].

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman, the facts are stated in the report, and I will not take the time of the committee to go into them; but in this case the lady slipped upon marble steps leading into the post-office building at Atlantic City. The steps had become worn because of usage by the public. The steps were slippery, and the subsequent report of the custodian was to the effect that the steps as maintained by the Government, inviting the public to use them for the purpose of transacting postal business in that office, should have been replaced by concrete steps, or at least proper rubber or brass appliances should have been placed upon them for the purpose of protecting people. Take the House Office Building, for instance. Everybody knows that marble, when worn, becomes very slippery. I maintain that the Government owes the public a duty to maintain a safe entrance to their public buildings where the public is invited to transact business.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOUSER. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The fact is that the entrance to the Atlantic City post office is in good condition to-day. It is a comparatively new building with granite steps instead of marble.

Mr. MOUSER. After the lady was injured granite steps were installed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no. The building was erected 25 years ago at North Carolina and Pacific Avenues.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is the main post office. Thousands upon thousands utilize it.

Mr. MOUSER. I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. STAFFORD. If we pass this kind of bills, we are just opening the gates of the Treasury.

Mr. MOUSER. The gentleman says in one breath that the building is new and in the next breath that the building has been in existence for 25 years. As a matter of fact, it was recommended after this accident to this lady that these steps be replaced by proper ones.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MOUSER. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The fact is this injury took place in 1917. The bill has been pending here all these years.

Mr. MOUSER. That is one further reason this lady ought to be paid. I think this is a worthy claim.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. EATON of Colorado, Mr. PATTERSON, and Mr. GRISWOLD objected, and the bill was referred to the deferred list.

ADA T. FINLEY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3633, for the relief of Ada T. Finley.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, this is one of the bills where Congress is called upon to find that this claimant suffered injury in 1928. The claim has been rejected by the Employees' Compensation Commission.

To my way of thinking it is bad practice for us to give by legislation a certificate of revival when the Compensation Commission, the agency to pass upon these cases, has turned them down.

Is there to be no limit, Mr. Chairman, where we are to be relieved of these minor matters? We passed a law on September 7, 1916, to throw this burden upon the Compensation Commission. The Compensation Commission investigated the case. The evidence was not sufficient. The gentleman seeks to have Congress make a mandatory finding that the claimant is entitled to the benefits of the act. I think it is a very questionable practice indeed.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I yield my time to the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not yield his time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. TARVER. I understand the gentleman can do that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EATON of Colorado rose.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I yield, if I can, to the gentleman from Colorado.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not recognize the right of the gentleman from Wisconsin to yield time to another Member.

The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to yield to me for a question before he yields the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, cases are presented in the House by the introduction of special bills for relief from action taken by the United States Employees' Compensation Commission to which the objections made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] properly apply. There are other cases of an entirely different nature, and the gentleman should not object to the passage of a bill merely by stating that it is one of a general class of cases, and evidently without having examined the facts in the particular case.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. Not at this time.

The gentleman stated this injury occurred in 1928. If the gentlemen of the committee will take the trouble to examine the report it will be found the lady interested in this case entered the employ of the Government on August 30, 1920, and served for five years as a follow-up nurse under the direction of the then Veterans' Bureau, and that she was relieved from duty in January, 1926, after approximately six years' service, because of physical disabilities, which had occurred during her service and which made it impossible for her to continue the performance of her duty.

A careful reading of the evidence in the report will disclose that Dr. J. D. L. McPheeters, an employee of the Government, a physician of the Veteran's Administration, or the Veterans' Bureau as it was then known, had direct supervision over Miss Finley, the claimant. He certifies to the extremely arduous nature of her duties and to the fact that, in his judgment as a physician, her disabilities arose because of, as they undoubtedly arose in the course of, her employment.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. TARVER. I am sorry, I can not yield to the gentleman. I have only five minutes.

Mr. Chairman, there is no evidence in the record showing this to be a case of the character which came up earlier in the evening, where some employee sustained a bruise on the head and it was claimed years afterwards that that resulted in his death.

During the last Congress the House passed without objection—and some of the gentlemen who are on the firing line to-day were officiating then in their laudable efforts to protect the United States Treasury—a bill which gave to a cow doctor working for the Bureau of Animal Industry compensation for a condition of tuberculosis that arose two years after he left the employment of the Government upon the assumption that his having had to do with tubercular cattle and their treatment during the course of his service had perhaps given rise to the condition of tuberculosis from which he suffered, a condition arising two years after discharge from employment.

Mr. BACHMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I can not yield.

Mr. BACHMANN. Will the gentleman yield in order that I may make a statement in his favor?

Mr. TARVER. With pleasure. I did not think the gentleman intended to make such a statement.

Mr. BACHMANN. I recall that during the last Congress I strenuously objected to this bill when I was handling the Private Calendar, and it did not pass. I have since thoroughly examined the report of the committee and the evidence, and I believe there is no question but what this case should be again sent to the Employees' Compensation Commission for their consideration, as a matter of justice and as a matter of right.

Mr. TARVER. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado, Mr. STAFFORD, and Mr. MOUSER objected, and the bill was referred to the deferred list.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I think we have worked long enough without a quorum. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the fact that in the event the committee should rise without the presence of a quorum it would be out of order to report these bills back to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BLANTON. I will withhold my point of no quorum if the gentleman from New York will move to rise.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and favorably report the bills laid aside.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BANKHEAD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that the committee having had under consideration bills on the Private Calendar, had directed him to report back to the House sundry bills without amendment, with the recommendation that the bills do pass, and a bill with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The following House bills, without amendment, were severally considered, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, were read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table:

H. R. 927. A bill for the relief of the estate of Franklin D. Clark; and

H. R. 1962. A bill for the relief of Noble Jay Hall.

The following House bill, with an amendment, was considered, the amendment agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table:

H. R. 2606. A bill for the relief of Edward Christianson.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of no quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman withhold it?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will withhold it.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BRUNNER, for the balance of the week, on account of illness.

To Mr. SEIBERLING, indefinitely, on account of injury.

To Mr. HAINES, on account of business.

To Mr. PETTENGILL, on account of business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman withhold that until I ask a question with reference to the program to-morrow?

Mr. BLACK. I will withhold it.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what the program for to-morrow is to be.

The SPEAKER. To-morrow, ordinarily, is Private Calendar Day. Just what the House desires to do to-morrow, the Chair does not know.

Mr. SNELL. Is it the expectation that the Private Calendar will be called?

The SPEAKER. It is expected at the present time that the Private Calendar will be called to-morrow.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-quarter of a minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, as is well known, the National Press Club to-morrow is giving a barbecue. It is giving this barbecue in honor of the club and of the distinguished president of that club and also in honor of our distinguished Speaker. The Members of the Congress are invited. The House of Representatives has almost finished its work, and we are now at least a month ahead of the Senate. In a few days we will be found resting on our oars, adjourning three days at a time, waiting for the Senate to catch up with us. In view of the fact that we are meeting to-morrow mainly for the purpose of calling it a "legislative day," so as to give status to a certain measure Monday, we ought to have an understanding that we will transact no important business to-morrow but will promptly adjourn after meeting, so that the membership may attend this old-time Texas barbecue that the National Press Club is so generously giving us.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin has made the point of order that there is not a quorum present. Evidently, there is not a quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, May 21, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

Tentative list of committee hearings scheduled for Saturday, May 21, 1932, as reported to the floor leader by the clerks of the several committees:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

CHILD WELFARE—ADDRESS BY DR. RAY LYMAN WILBUR

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in the RECORD of May 18 the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] had inserted what purported to be excerpts from a speech by Secretary of the Interior Wilbur before the annual meeting of the National Conference of Social Work, Philadelphia, Pa., Monday, May 16, 1924. I ask now that the speech as it was actually delivered may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The speech is as follows:

CHILDREN IN NATIONAL EMERGENCIES

The most hopeful and outstanding quality of our present generation is that it has become child conscious. Who except the mothers worried about the children during the campaigns of Julius Cæsar or the Thirty Years' War or during the Napoleonic era? Individuals and nations have passed through many a crisis in the forward march of civilization. The importance of childhood was dramatized by the Commission for Relief in Belgium and the American Relief Administration. This came at a time when we were thinking in new terms. Medicine and science had brought new opportunities for the saving of lives. In our own land large families and plenty of little graves about the church had been the order of the day.

Child labor was taken for granted with the first development of modern industry. To be bound out replaced high-school or college education for the great mass of American boys in the new agricultural portions of the United States before our own Civil War. Now, our experience with the White House Conference on Child Health and Protection at least tells us that our children come first. When trouble and danger threaten, whether it is on shipboard in a storm, or a disaster on land, or a financial crash in a family, men have learned to act to protect the future as well as to meet the present. It is this ability to think and plan that has pushed civilization ahead. The controlling idea in the saying, "women and children first," is an almost instinctive reaction of preparation for the future. In the century that we have been building up our present form of world civilization based on the striking advances made in information and in the practical application of inventions and discoveries, we have learned to think of our children in other terms than as prospective cannon fodder or as brainless working machines.

An advancing civilization is characterized by its preservation of dependents of all sorts. We can view some of these dependents as the inevitable heritages of our existence. I refer to the children who have not reached the self-sustaining age or the aged who have passed that period. The more we have of those who live upon others because of physical handicaps, diseases, injuries, mental states, or as pensioners the more difficult it is for us to navigate the craft of civilization. One of our newer conceptions is to make the handicapped do something to work at least a part of their way. One of the stark, cold facts that face us is that in the preparation for war, in the conduct of war, and in the payment for wars engaged in lies our largest source of unremunerative expenditures from the standpoint of the progress of the race. Every ex-soldier attached to the Public Treasury is an exhibit in the campaign which should be constantly waged for the prevention of war. From a broad social standpoint we must use prevention in this field as we do in that of disease and of social disqualifications of all sorts if we are to avoid the paralyzing handicaps of a burden which may become too great for us to carry.

Now, as a sequel to the insanity of a great war the ordered processes of society have been temporarily halted or deranged. We give this condition the name "depression," indicative of our point of view that we are below a normal and accepted level of activities. Experience, too, has shown us that our progress and activities have in them the rhythms of rise and fall that are characteristic of the tides of the sea and the beats of the heart. These have come and gone throughout the ages. One of our difficulties is to maintain during the sublevel period the fundamental verities of life so that we can use them as a basis upon which to build in order to return to normal, or even beyond that to one of those periods of supernormal, which gives us the greatest emotional satisfactions.

Let us analyze some of the factors of interest in this present instance in so far as they may concern children. We have been so close to the benefits derived from the discoveries of such men as Pasteur and Koch that I think we have failed to grasp the revolutionary effect that they have had upon the protection of childhood. Our new knowledge of nutrition, particularly of infant feeding, has had much to do with the improvement in our morbidity and mortality rates. At the same time, our Republic, from its very earliest days, has been increasingly successful in its goal of universal education. Out of all this and from many other sources new standards have been created for the nurture or handling of children. The White House Conference on the Care and Protection of Children took the measure of these present methods and outlined for us many undeveloped possibilities for the future.

Because of the past experiences of the race and our recent contact with the faulty nutrition of European children suffering from war and postwar conditions, there has been a rather universal fear that the American child would be unduly harmed by the difficulties through which we are passing. Personally, and speaking broadly, I think that unless we descend to a level far beyond anything that we at present have known, our children are apt to profit rather than suffer from what is going on. We must set up the neglect of prosperity against the care of adversity. With prosperity, many parents unload the responsibilities for their children on to others. With adversity the home takes its more normal place. There is no substitute for intelligent parental care exercised throughout the day, at mealtimes, and in controlling proper sleeping conditions at night. More important still, there is no substitute for the parent in the development of the spiritual, moral, and mental make-up of the child.

It is difficult to judge by figures just what is taking place, but the reduced mortality rate for infants and for children reported for the past winter certainly does not harmonize with the dire prophecies of those who are inclined to see both "blue" and "red" in the present situation. The interest of thousands of keen and well-trained people throughout our whole country in seeing that our children are properly fed and cared for has given many of them better and more suitable food than in past good times. Those economically able to care adequately for their children have been doing it better because of a willingness to accept the expert information which is available to a degree never before attained.

It is important not to be confused by the present situation regarding the adolescent and past adolescent youth of America and Europe. We must realize that they have been disturbed and markedly influenced by the disorder of the war period and the demoralization which has followed it. War makes deep wounds in the young people who live through it. Youthful crime is apparently more evident in European countries, as well as here, than before. I view it as the result of the breakdown in the normal conditions of the home and in the general attitudes of the community rather than to anything that is happening at the moment. We pay our bills slowly for the mistakes that we make with our children, but there is an inevitable quality about these debts that shows the need of our present planning. The war scars on our children will bring many of them down in the years yet to come.

This makes a careful analysis of what is going on with our children in this present emergency of great significance for the future. Was there ever a time in the history of the world when children as a group had the advantages of our own boys and girls of to-day? Compared with a century ago, we can say that as they have lost some of the protections of the home they have gained new protections in the community.

Our educational system has developed so that we have added greatly to the training of almost all of our boys and girls. At the same time, with public health organizations, recreational activities, playgrounds, and welfare organizations, we have new and necessary additions to our equipment in the care of youth. Fortunately, too, our conception of childhood has undergone an almost startling change. The browbeating, harsh discipline of a generation or two ago has become uncommon instead of being the rule. Again, we are much more conscious of our children and of what they are doing. Probably no generation has thought more about what youth is doing than has ours. Perhaps it is due to the fact that we have more ways of communicating with each other than other generations have had. There is a sense of collective responsibility for children that is reflected in beautiful school buildings, attractive playgrounds, fine hospitals, and subscriptions to the community funds. There are great and terrible gaps yet to be filled, but we are conscious of their presence.

The behavior problems of children have become of community as well as of family interest. In our endeavors to use the old faulty, arbitrary methods of punishment which we have inherited from the tyrannies, hates, and heedlessness of the past, as our children have been given range, we have been increasingly taking them under public control. A prison with children in it is a ghastly souvenir of horrid memories and a living evidence of incompetence. At the moment we are sensing that the application of well-tried but faulty methods to children is associated with a very high percentage of failure. The juvenile court is an attempt to make our legal and penal system apply to children. It does not and will not. We must view children from entirely fresh standpoints in their relationships to the community. Sin may mean something to you or me, but it takes much experimentation for it to mean anything to an aggressive child. Can we not free little children from the enmeshments of law and deal with them on a basis of training? Every child brought out of the criminal class and made self-supporting is a net gain for us all. Our pocketbooks pay for our failures. Do we ever stop to think when we read that some one has been sentenced for 10 years that it means that we must pay out several thousand dollars for custodial care? Certainly for youth at least these sums should go for reconstruction.

We now realize, too, that comparatively few children are born diseased and with addled mental or deficient physical equipment, and that there is no inborn general physical condition that leads to unsocial behavior, delinquency, and criminal tendencies in general. Certain physical defects and diseases and mental peculiarities have a relation to the incidents of misconduct, but they are not all controlling. Children are all different from each other and require individual handling. We recognize that the wildest horses properly trained and guided often make the best horses to ride. The child with daring qualities offers the most if properly directed. These qualities may be the forerunner of great power or of important discoveries or the trying out of those new experiments that are so significant in our progress. What we classify as misbehavior at the present time may become qualities that can be turned to use instead of misuse. The present emphasis on youthful crime may have the merit of forcing solutions.

This depression has made us sensitive to conditions which with prosperity would have escaped our notice. When things are going well a margin of failure is readily wiped out or not noticed. When they are not going so well failure must be analyzed and reduced. We need a new perspective instead of continuing to work up and down the old track. My diagnosis is that our present civilization is broken out with the hives. They irritate and bother us; they show us that we need some changes in our physical organization, but they are not evidences of fatal or fundamental weaknesses. Hives are as transitory as they are annoying, if proper living is had and appropriate remedies are taken.

National emergencies force realities upon us. In this present one we are now passing from the whining and blame-some-one-else period to one of counting our blessings every once in a while and getting ready to meet the situation. This has brought good fortune to our children in a number of ways. With real thought and discussion on the part of both parents and public alike, the expert is being asked what to do. This is a good combination, since the desire to do better can be hooked up with the knowledge of what to do and how to do it.

One difficulty with all of us humans is that we are apt to view problems from the standpoint of personal experiences. Those who are close to some cities in this country where the economic maladjustment has been marked and who have been devoting their time to relieving distress are apt to see the whole situation from the standpoint of this painful experience. On the other hand, those who are associated with communities where everything is going reasonably well are inclined to think that conditions elsewhere are exaggerated. But in the broad I think we can say that this national emergency is being met in so far as children are concerned in new and satisfactory ways that can well encourage us for the future. We are cashing in on the health programs of the past. Our great educational mechanism is doing its job well in spite of reduced finances. There is a greater available food supply and more knowledge of how to use it than ever before. Again, we have playground, recreational, and other facilities that have been built up in the past few decades. Our whole scheme of physical training and athletic games gives us wholesome use for increased leisure time. Moreover, we can say that our present emergency has not driven millions of children into industrial labor. The machine has given us many problems but it has taken many hard tasks out of the weak arms of children. The emphasis upon amusement instead of recreation, the apparent decrease in substantial reading, and behavior problems of various sorts, give us real concern. The more widespread tendency to gambling by both adults and youth is one of the most demoralizing factors in our present American life. The gambling spirit gives just the wrong turn to growing children who need to think in terms of security, stability, and honest endeavor, rather than of chance.

Most important of all is the question of whether our national emergency is damaging for children those ultimate spiritual values that are so vitally needed. Religion has for many children taken on new and somewhat disturbing aspects. My contact with youth would indicate that they are wholesome, genuine, and fact facing in their points of view. Even in this period of change, which is also a period of stress when there is bound to be maladjustment, our children are riding out of the confusion with astonishing poise. They, of course, catch the uncertainties and worries of their elders. Since the greatest needs that children have are those of security and of the opportunity for growth, the significance of the family is of unique importance. If this national emergency will teach us that there is no possible method of replacing the family and the home, and that our economic and social scheme should include in it those factors that will do the most for the home, it will be worth the price. Home means so much. Yet it is a hideous hole for millions of our children. Low prices favor the efforts to blot out slums and transitional areas.

Regardless of material accumulation and the rapid growth of so-called wealth that has come to us in America, due to growth and industry, I am satisfied that the only really worth-while values in the human race are associated with children. Mothers in industry give me a sinking at the heart. We can afford to put more principal in our children and less in the savings bank. The national emergency should teach us that material gain is transient and that the figures used to measure it are not a suitable standard by which to judge achievement, happiness, or health. Our civilization will be measured by the children it produces and by the civilization they in turn produce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Pauly Manufacturing Co., signed by A. A. Pauly, of Washington, D. C., relative to an amendment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, permitting manufacturers to get loans directly from the corporation when they are able to give assurance that the money advanced will be used productively to create employment, producing, useful, standard commercial products at a cost insuring profit when marketed, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts presented a memorial of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on the automobile industry, and favoring instead some form of general sales tax, with necessary exemptions, to be included in the pending revenue bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

TAXES ON THE AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I present memorials signed by Mr. Leonard B. Colt, of Providence, and 204 other citizens of Rhode Island, which read as follows:

> The undersigned earnestly oppose passage by Congress of a bill singling out automotive products for taxation. We urge that instead some form of general sales tax, with exemptions such as agricultural products, food, and clothing, be used to raise the necessary revenue, and that automotive levies be completely removed from the tax bill.
> We ask you to vote against automotive taxes as such and use your influence to prevent their imposition.

I ask that the memorials may lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorials will be received and lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF THE NAVAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably sundry nominations of officers in the Navy and the Marine Corps, which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GEORGE:

A bill (S. 4718) for the relief of H. B. Arnold; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BRATTON:

A bill (S. 4719) granting a pension to Joseph F. Haynes; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FRAZIER:

A bill (S. 4720) granting a pension to Margaret M. Miller (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BROOKHART:

A bill (S. 4721) authorizing the President to present in the name of Congress a medal of honor to Clarence D. Chamberlin; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma:

A bill (S. 4722) for the relief of W. A. Peters; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 4723) for the relief of Henry Charles O'Dell; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. WALCOTT:

A bill (S. 4724) for the refund of income and profits taxes erroneously collected; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. HAWES, Mr. WALCOTT, Mr. McNARY, Mr. NORBECK, and Mr. PITTMAN.

A bill (S. 4726) to supplement the migratory bird conservation act by providing funds for the acquisition of areas for use as migratory bird sanctuaries, refuges, and breeding grounds, for developing and administering such areas, for the protection of certain migratory birds, for the enforcement of the migratory bird treaty act and regulations thereunder, and for other purposes; to the Special Committee on Conservation of Wild Life Resources.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. THOMAS of Idaho, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the following bills, and they were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

S. 2613. An act for the relief of Lynn Brothers' Benevolent Hospital; and

S. 3188. An act for the relief of Dr. A. M. Newton, of Pocatello, Idaho.

REVENUE AND TAXATION—AMENDMENTS

Mr. BINGHAM and Mr. HULL each submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to House bill 10236, the revenue and taxation bill, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

REPEAL OF THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. BINGHAM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 31) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> On page 2, line 2, insert before the period a semicolon and the following: "except that no State may prohibit the transportation of intoxicating liquors in bond across its territory if such liquors are shipped in interstate commerce between points wholly outside the territorial limits of such State."

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. TRAMMELL obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to have the pending amendment read so it may appear in the RECORD?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment will be read.

The amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the committee is, on page 244, line 7, after the word "measure," to insert:

Phosphate rock (phosphorites, collophane, and apatites) containing more than 70 per cent of tribasic phosphate of lime, 8 cents per 100 pounds."

So as to make the committee amendment read:

(6) Lumber, rough, or planed or dressed on one or more sides, $3 per 1,000 feet, board measure; phosphate rock (phosphorites, collophane and apatites) containing more than 70 per cent of tribasic phosphate of lime, 8 cents per 100 pounds; but the tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the previous votes on tariff items in the pending bill indicate that at least a majority of the Senate, though only a small majority, are favorable to the consideration of meritorious, as they see it, items for tariff. That being the declared policy of at least a majority of the Senate, I have felt it my duty to propose the amendment which is now pending respecting a very vital industry in my State, namely, that of phosphate mining, or phosphate products.

For a number of years under the antidumping provision of the law we have, in substance, had a tariff of about $2.62 on importations of phosphate. The Moroccan Government has been the principal exporter to this country of phosphate; and based upon the contention that the Moroccan phosphate was mined largely by convict labor, and that the producers there had carried on a dumping process in the United States, the customs appraiser at New York has held in regard to all the importations up to a very recent date that they were subject to the antidumping provisions of the law. He therefore has required the payment of a tax of about $2.62 per ton or else a bond for this amount pending the adjustment of the question.

The action of the customs appraiser was in recent months reversed by the Customs Court of Appeals. That decision is now on appeal. Should the decision finally be that this product is not subject to the antidumping provision of the law it would mean a removal of the present protection of about $2.62 per ton on phosphate. It is this situation which I seek to provide for in the amendment now pending.

The domestic phosphate industry has largely been driven from the field of exportation, due to Moroccan competition. The Moroccan Government on Government-owned land, with a subsidy, operates its phosphate mines and has set out upon a policy of endeavoring to monopolize the trade in practically all countries to which heretofore American producers have exported the product. They also have designs upon the American trade. On account of entering Austria with prices of about $4 or $4.50 upon phosphate, when American producers can not afford to sell it for less than $6 or $7 a ton delivered there, they have driven our American product from Austria, and they have gained a major portion of the trade in Spain, in France, and in Germany. I think the American industry has lost approximately a million tons of exportations to those countries within the last two or three years. The Moroccans started in upon a policy of bringing their product into America and offering it at a price, it is estimated, of $2.62 a ton below the price which the American producers could afford to market their own product.

If the court of last resort shall hold that the American phosphate industry is not entitled to protection under the antidumping law, it will mean that the Moroccan phosphate will have a differential of $2.62 over the American product.

I propose an amendment which, if adopted, will give our producers approximately $1.75 a ton protection, which will be a reduction of about 90 cents a ton below the protection which they have heretofore enjoyed under the antidumping provision of the present law. So the adoption of the amendment would not mean an increase of protection—it would mean a reduction of protection to the extent of about 90 cents per ton. Of course, the amendment is offered in anticipation that if the court of final resort shall reverse the decision of the appraiser that the antidumping provision applies, thus affording a protection of $2.62 a ton, the industry will, in that event, still have some protection.

The phosphate-mining industry is of great importance in my State. That is where the mines are operated far more extensively than elsewhere throughout the United States, although there are large deposits in Tennessee and a number of Western States. It is said that the largest deposits probably are in Montana or Wyoming, at any rate, in some section in the West.

This industry employs in prosperous times about 8,000 people in mining alone, and indirectly through its operation it provides employment for an enormous amount of labor on the railroads and at the ports. In prosperous times one can go to a port in Florida where phosphate is handled and see from 200 to 500 people working on the docks loading the ships with phosphate. I do not think I overestimate when I state that at least 50,000 people gain their sustenance through the operation of the phosphate industry in Florida, 8,000 connected directly with the mines, and the others employed in connection with various other aspects of the industry.

I witnessed on yesterday a majority of the Senate taking the position that the people of this country should be subjected to whatever effect a tax of $2 a short ton on coal or $2.20 on a long ton of coal would have. I witnessed a majority of the Senate voting for a tariff of 2½ cents a gallon on gasoline, 4 cents a gallon on lubricating oil, and 10 cents a hundred, as I recall, on asphalt; and yet I do not believe that in a single instance the industries for which protection has thus been afforded are so much in need of assistance or more deserving of a remedy for the conditions under which they labor than is the phosphate industry of Florida.

Mr. President, this amendment applies to phosphate that is used in the chemical industry only, but does not apply to the lower grades of phosphate which are used in fertilizer. When we had this question before the Senate once before, it was stated that the imposition of a tariff on phosphate probably would affect the price of fertilizer. This particular amendment, I repeat, would not apply to the lower grades of phosphate which enter into the making of fertilizer, but it applies only to the higher grades which are used in the chemical industry but not in the preparation of fertilizer. Even if it did apply to the phosphate used in fertilizer, it would not mean an increase in the price, because, as I have before stated, at the present time and ever since we have been threatened with competition from the Moroccan phosphate the industry has had the benefit of about $2.62 a ton protection under the antidumping clause of the act, and my amendment provides for a tariff of 90 cents per ton less than that. So the adoption of the amendment can not result in any increase in the prices of phosphate over the existing prices or the prices that have heretofore prevailed for years. Its only object is and its only result will be that if by the court of last resort the tax of $2.62 per ton which has heretofore been imposed under the antidumping clause of the law shall be declared inoperative and void, then the product will fall into a lower bracket and will have a protective-tariff duty of $1.75 a ton, a reduction of about 90 cents a ton from the present tax.

Mr. President, the phosphate industry has been one of the important activities in Florida for 30 or 40 years. It has operated without any substantial financial success; in fact, I may say that it has had to struggle all these years on account of domestic competition. There is no monopoly; there is no combination among the phosphate operators, but there is the strongest kind of domestic competition, and I have never heard from those who consume phosphate in this country or elsewhere that the prices have been exorbitant. The prices are remarkably low, considering the character of the operations, the enormous amount of capital invested, and the wages paid to the miners.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. DILL. As I understand, the phosphate covered by the Senator's amendment is not the phosphate commonly used on the farm?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I so stated. The phosphate used in connection with fertilizer is of the lower grades, while the phosphate of the higher percentages is used in the chemical industry.

There is another point in favor of this amendment. Under the conditions which now prevail, and which have prevailed heretofore, the $2.62 a ton tariff which has been imposed under the antidumping act has applied to all grades of phosphates, while, on the other hand, the amendment which I have proposed applies only to the higher grades which are used in the chemical industry and are not used at all in connection with the making of fertilizer. So this amendment, considering existing conditions and those which have prevailed, would, if it should influence the market either up or down, influence it downward both on the product which is used in chemicals and that which is used in fertilizer, while it would not apply to the kind of phosphate that is used in fertilizer.

The policy having been declared of imposing a tariff, I feel that I am thoroughly justified in offering this amendment and most earnestly urging its adoption. It certainly will not harm anyone. It will not result in any increase in prices, and it will assist in maintaining a very important industry in my State, an industry involving as much labor and as much capital as a great many of the other items which have heretofore been recognized in dealing with the tariff and providing a remedy for protection of an industry.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] yesterday stated that if this coal tariff could be put through, it would result in the employment of a thousand more men. In dealing with the phosphate industry, if it is left absolutely alone and unprotected, if the courts should set aside the existing tariff in substance of $2.62 per ton, it probably would result in driving out of employment some six or eight thousand people—not merely 1,000, but some six or eight thousand—and would destroy the employment which arises from, and is contingent upon, the maintenance of this great industry.

I hope very much that the Senate will see fit to adopt this amendment; and I am sure that those who voted for the tariffs on all the other items, and have made their declaration of policy that tariff items are proper in this bill, will cooperate with me in giving this protection to a very important American industry, and one of peculiar importance in my State.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of to-day's business the Senate shall take a recess until 11 o'clock on Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator what time he has fixed for a recess to-day?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not fixed any time.

Mr. KING. I think we had better fix it at 1 o'clock and have the two conjoined.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 927. An act for the relief of the estate of Franklin D. Clark;

H. R. 1962. An act for the relief of Noble Jay Hall; and

H. R. 2606. An act for the relief of Edward Christianson.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, as evidence of the extent to which the farmer does not receive a fair share of the consumer's dollar, I call attention to a study made by the Federal Trade Commission a few years ago concerning Competition and Profits in Bread and Flour, which showed that the farmer at that time received only 13.4 per cent of the retail price of a 1-pound loaf of bread. This study was based upon the period 1922–1924. During the same period the average farm price of wheat was $1.06 per bushel, whereas in April, 1931, the price received by farmers was 43.1 cents per bushel. The average retail price of bread in the United States for the period 1922–1924 was 8.7 cents, whereas the average price of bread in April, 1932, was 6.9 cents. Consequently the farmer to-day would receive a materially smaller percentage of the retail price of bread than in 1922–1924—21 per cent less.

Wheat is the principal ingredient of bread, and yet the farmer receives only a small percentage of the price paid by the consumer. In between the farmers are a host of middlemen, each one reaping a profit. The local elevator man who receives the wheat from the farmer, the railroad which hauls the wheat from the elevator to the terminal market, the terminal elevator which stores the wheat at the terminal market, the terminal-market broker who sells it to another broker—not to mention miscellaneous speculators in the futures market who buy and sell without any intention to deliver the product—the miller who purchases the wheat from the terminal-market broker, the railroad which hauls the wheat from the terminal market to the mill, the wholesale baker who buys the flour from the mill, the railroad which hauls the flour from the mill to the wholesale baker, and finally the retailer who sells the bread to the consumer—all take their toll of profit between the farmer and the bread consumer. It is now about 90 per cent to the middleman; 10 per cent to the farmer.

We have built up an elaborate and wasteful system of distribution, which results in the farmer receiving less than a just share of the retail price for his products and the consumer paying more than his just share for them.

Numerous other studies of the percentage of the consumer's dollar received by the farmer have been made by various agencies. These studies, which were made several years ago, indicate that the farmers received from 15 per cent of the consumer's dollar in the case of cotton goods to 71½ per cent in the case of butter, but the most frequent rate was between 25 per cent and 35 per cent of the consumer's dollar. In one-half of the total number of instances studied, the farmers received less than 36 per cent of the consumer's dollar.

Mr. President, I desire to insert in the RECORD at this point two tables setting forth the results of these studies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The tables are as follows:

Distribution of the consumer's price of a pound of bread for the years 1922–1924 [1]

Mr. HOWELL. A distinguished economist and authority on business conditions, Dr. Julius Klein, the Assistant Secretary of Commerce, recently stated in a radio address that the process of distribution has almost gotten out of hand, and that the unnecessary costs and waste in distribution totaled from ten to twelve and one-half billion dollars annually. Suppose this sum, which is wasted annually by inefficient and wasteful distribution processes, were to be distributed equally among all the 25,000,000 families in the United States; it would mean an increased income of $400 to $500 annually for each family. Suppose that this huge sum were divided equally between the producers on the one hand and the consumers on the other; it would mean an added income of from five to six and one-fourth billion dollars for each group annually. The farmers' share, distributed among 6,000,000 farmers, would mean, relatively, a very greatly increased income per year.

This enormous amount represents waste and unnecessary costs in the distribution process. Suppose we added to that sum the excess profits now exacted by middlemen between the farmer and the consumer; the total savings to the farmers and the consumers would be far in excess of that amount.

Yet what has this Congress done since the day it convened December 7 last to remedy this situation? True, we now have two farm bills on the Senate calendar. But what has Congress definitely accomplished to help the farmer obtain a fair share of the consumer's dollar? What has it definitely accomplished to relieve the inequality between what the farmer receives and what the middlemen receive for processing and handling the products of the farmer?

I again call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this Congress has not passed, nor even yet considered, one measure to restore equality to agriculture.

Mr. President, I submit that agriculture must be rescued.

CAUSES OF THE DEPRESSION

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, this discussion of tariff issues is leading us only into confusion. No relief for this great depression will come out of this tax bill. In fact, there are many things about it that may intensify the depression.

I, therefore, desire to discuss to some extent the causes of the depression, and the things that I deem necessary and that this session of Congress can do, if it wants to do them, to restore us to a condition of prosperity.

Practically all of the general publicity is to the effect that this depression was caused by the World War; and it is passed off in that summary manner without any analysis of the real facts that have caused the depression.

I deny that the war caused the depression in the United States. I think it is responsible for the world-wide depression, but the United States has a distinctly different standing from the other countries that participated in the war.

At the beginning of the war we were a debtor nation. We owed other peoples five or six billions of dollars. In a short time, out of war profits, we paid all of those debts. Then, after we entered the war, that stimulated other great war profits and we levied taxes upon them, and collected enough so that our Government loaned about $11,000,000,000 more to foreign peoples and foreign nations. Then private interests in the United States collected other still greater war profits, and they have been able to lend fifteen or sixteen billion dollars more. We have that much earmarked. That makes about $32,000,000,000 of war profits which we can recognize.

On yesterday the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] estimated that our investments all together of all kinds in foreign countries are about $45,000,000,000; and, of course, those huge sums were realized out of the war in war profits or out of the aftermath of the war.

Mr. President, when a nation is a profiteer to that extent it can not go into depression. True, we have a national debt, but that has been paid down to about $16,000,000,000. If we would use the definite amounts loaned by the Government and private parties which we know, and subtract that from the thirty-one or thirty-two billion dollars we can earmark, there is still left a net profit of fifteen or sixteen billion dollars. If we add to that twelve or thirteen billion dollars of other investments, we have the enormous sum of about $45,000,000,000 in profits, instead of losses, growing out of the war.

Mr. President, I concede that the lending of this money to foreign countries and to foreign peoples would lay the foundation for a depression. If a farmer should sell his farm and then lend the money to somebody who could not or would not repay it, that would start him toward depression. The same is true of a nation. However, I do not think those loans and investments in and of themselves are great enough to cause this greatest of all our depressions, and I think we have to look into our own affairs and make an analysis of the laws of our own country and of their effect in order to determine exactly what is the trouble with the United States.

I concede that Germany, that Austria, that Russia, even France and England and Italy, who won the war, if anybody did win it, were thrown into depression as a result of the war, because, in spite of their reparations and all other collections, they were losers, and heavy losers, both in men and material, as a result of the war. The debts and obligations created against them are enough to put them into depression.

I have certainly pointed out how the United States is in altogether a different position. Then what are the causes of this depression in the United States? I think it is largely due to laws, laws passed by the Congress of the United States, assisted to some extent by certain State laws. I want to name some of those laws and briefly point out their effect in creating discrimination in our economic organization.

First let us take the transportation act of 1920. I will not go into the details of overcapitalization and watered value as a result of that law, amounting to over $7,000,000,000. I will not take up the details of the wastes of competition left under that law, of the capitalizations of unearned increment, and the excess profits of inside or subsidiary corporations. But altogether, Mr. President, that law raised railroad rates upon agriculture about 60 per cent. That 60 per cent of increase resulted in a decrease in the prices of farm products by the amount of that increase in rates, because, as we shall see, the farmer's price is fixed by the sale of his exportable surplus in the free-trade markets of the world, and he must pay the freight to those markets. Hence whatever increase occurs in either rail or ocean freight decreases the prices of his products in the world market.

That, Mr. President, was a little start toward the agricultural depression. That put an extra heavy burden upon agriculture and gave an extra special privilege to the owners of the railroads of the United States. But that was not the greatest of the causes. I think in ordinary times that might be 25 per cent of the cause of an agricultural depression in our country. But, perhaps, due to the greater cause, the deflation policy of the Federal reserve system in 1920, that percentage should be reduced.

I have told many times the story and the details of that depression policy of the Federal Reserve Board advisory council and the class A directors. I am not going to repeat that story to-day, but I am going to repeat the quotation from the Manufacturers' Record, official paper of the National Manufacturers' Association over in Baltimore, a paper, however, which has always told us the truth about this deflation policy of 1920.

It said that as a result of that policy agriculture was deflated in the whole sum of $32,000,000,000. That is billions, not millions. It takes a thousand millions to make each one of those billions. Eighteen of those billions it placed upon the decline in land values, and the other 14 upon the two crops of 1920 and 1921.

That is the greatest cause of the agricultural depression. In the fall of 1920 the Federal reserve system generally put on a policy of restricting its loans to member banks. In the spring of 1920 it had generally and uniformly encouraged the increase of those loans. I have seen many letters all the way from Cleveland, Ohio, to California, in which the reserve banking system encouraged its member banks to rediscount more paper, take that money home, lend it out to start new enterprises, to enlarge old enterprises, and to pass prosperity around. That was the general tone after the war was over, in the early part of 1919.

It was a Wall Street rumble in the latter part of the year which changed that, and said, "We are overinflated. There are too many Federal reserve loans, and they must be reduced." Then there followed a meeting of the Federal Reserve Board, on May 18, 1920, and meeting with that board were the class A directors and the advisory council of the Federal reserve system.

It is not necessary for anybody to speculate or guess about what was done in that meeting. I have here the minutes of the meeting, Senate Document No. 310 of the Sixty-seventh Congress, fourth session, presented by the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] himself. That meeting discussed three policies, first, that of general deflation, and by resolution officially indorsed Governor Harding's speech calling for such general deflation of Federal reserve loans.

Mr. President, I maintain that as an economic policy a reserve bank has no right ever to even consider a general policy of deflation. I say that is always an economic crime. I concede the right of a Federal reserve system to prevent inflation. It has the right to say "no" when its member banks are asking for loans which will amount to inflation. But after having approved those loans and, in this case, after having solicited such loans, then to turn around and put on a general policy of calling those loans, and thus destroying the enterprises created by them, or enlarged by them, I denounce as an economic crime always. Yet that meeting did that identical thing and passed that resolution.

There was another resolution passed, sending a committee to the Interstate Commerce Commission to ask an increase of railroad rates. I want Senators to draw a picture, for a moment, of this great board, with more economic power than any board ever created in this world, more economic power than that of the Kaiser and the Czar combined in their palmiest days. It met here for the purpose of considering a general deflation, but at the same time proposed to inflate the railroads by further increasing the rate.

I have listened to the defenders of that meeting. I have heard their apologies and their excuses; but when I have laid that railroad resolution down before them they have all backed away from it, and no word of defense for that has ever come to me.

Perhaps the most fatal part of that proceeding was in secret. All the proceedings were not secret. A resolution of the United States Senate had asked them something about the deflation passed the day before, and in answer to that they gave a statement to the Senate and the press of the country. But in that statement and in their publicity nothing was said about the secret policy which they considered, and which amounts to about two-thirds of all these proceedings. That policy was to force this deflation by raising the discount rate so high the member banks could not afford to pay it.

As the meeting adjourned Governor Harding said:

I would suggest, gentlemen, that you be careful and not give out anything about any discussion of discount rates. That is one thing there ought not be any previous discussion about, because it disturbs everybody; and if people think rates are going to be advanced, there will be an immediate rush to get into the banks before the rates are put up, and the policy of the Reserve Board is that that is one thing we never discuss with a newspaperman. If he comes in and wants to know if the board has considered the rates or is likely to do anything about the rates, some remark is made about the weather or something else, and we tell him we can not discuss rates at all. I think we are all agreed it would be very ill-advised to give out any impression that any general overhauling of rates was discussed at this conference.

Under that injunction of secrecy they adjourned.

Mr. President, ordinary people knew nothing about the secret policy that was considered there, but big business knew about it. Big business had its bankers right in that meeting. I have asked more than half a million people if they knew of that at the time, some of the biggest commercial organizations and chambers of commerce in the country, and no hand has ever gone up. Ordinary people did not know of it, ordinary bankers even did not know of it, many big bankers did not know of it.

I talked to the president of the American Bankers' Association, Walter W. Head, and his bank out in Omaha, Nebr., three years after that meeting was held and he knew nothing of this policy except as the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] and I showed him the minutes of it there that day. But big business knew about it, and big business went out immediately to get loans to protect itself through this depression that was sure to follow that action.

Armour & Co. borrowed $60,000,000, and they got it for 10 years' time, and they paid 8 per cent to get the money.

I told this story not long ago at the national convention of the retail meat dealers of the United States at West Baden, Ind., with Mr. Lee, president of Armour Co., sitting on the stage with me. His was one hand that ought to have gone up when I asked for hands, but it did not.

Swift & Co. got their $50,000,000 loan a little later, and Sinclair got a loan before this meeting was even held. They knew it was coming. These three are only samples of what happened to big business throughout the country. Henry Ford is the only one I know of who did not understand the situation. There may have been others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Will the Senator from Iowa permit the Chair to ask him from whom the loans were obtained?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. George M. Reynolds sent the Armour paper out to the banks all over my State and in Illinois and other States to correspondent banks, and they sold it out like they do paper and bonds for banks. It was sold all over Iowa. I know of one Iowa Congressman who bought $2,000 of that paper. In that way in a very short time the company had its $60,000,000 and the other companies had theirs. They are only samples. They are not any worse than hundreds of others that went out and gathered up all the available credit in the country. But they did more than that.

When I first told the story of that meeting out in my State, an editor who had been Secretary of Agriculture got after me because I said he was sitting around and did not inform us about this at the time. He said they talked about deflation, but they did not deflate. Then he published the figures to show that they increased the Federal reserve loans several hundred millions of dollars after the meeting was held; and that is true. Why did they do that? By an official resolution and a unanimous vote they decided that we were overinflated, that there were too many Federal reserve loans and they must be reduced, and then immediately violated their own decision, immediately increased those loans several hundred million dollars more.

Mr. President, there is just one explanation of that. It was done by these men to get the credit they needed to tide them through the depression that was sure to follow. They were all set and all ready by October, 1920. Remember, this meeting was held on the 18th of May. Then they called in their member banks, but not till October. They even held public meetings. I attended one in Iowa where the representative of the Chicago branch of the Federal reserve bank said to us, "We have been awfully good to you out here in Iowa and loaned you $91,000,000 when your Federal reserve loan allotment called for only $36,000,000 for the whole State. You are $55,000,000 over your allotment right now. The time has come when the people entitled to that $55,000,000 want it, so you will have to sell your crops and reduce those loans." That was in October of 1920.

I stood up and asked who made this allotment of $36,000,000 of Federal reserve loans to the State of Iowa. He did not know. I have asked members of the Federal reserve clear through the system and nobody knows. The fact is no such allotment was ever made. There is no authority in the law for it and there is no sense in it. Iowa's original agricultural crop production was nearly $1,000,000,000 in those days, and in ordinary times it is $500,000,000 or $600,000,000. It is not that much in these extraordinary times now. The industrial production was $500,000,000 or $600,000,000 more. Against all of that to allot only $36,000,000 of Federal reserve loans is an indefensible idea to start with. It was simply a straw man set up to have a talking point, to force the deflation, and it was the Wall Street credit, the speculators' credit, which we are investigating now in the Banking and Currency Committee, that wanted the deflation.

It seems to me, as we look into that crowd, that what they want is things to be going up or down, and they do not care which way; but they want to know which way things will go so they can take the proper side for profit on the various markets.

Mr. President, when the reserve banks instructed their member banks to reduce their Federal reserve loans there was only one way the member banks could do it, and that was to call in their customers and require them to pay their notes. They would call in a farmer and tell him he must reduce his loan. He would say, "My stuff is not ready to go." Then he would be told, "But you have some Liberty bonds." He would say, "Yes; but I do not want to sell those. I bought them for my children." They would say the loan must be reduced and they would force him to sell those bonds, and they did force the sale of such bonds until Liberty bonds went down as low as 80 cents on the dollar, and I found one man in Ohio who sold his bonds at 79 cents on the dollar. He was forced to sell them at the time of the deflation.

Mr. President, after those bonds were forced down these men who had gathered up the credit of the country had money to buy them and there was an enormous profit to be taken out of the speculation in Liberty bonds themselves, and that when these people had bought these bonds to save the life of the Government itself. But the farmers did not have enough bonds to meet the demand and that forced them to sell their livestock, their grain, and crops generally, and the result was the greatest panic in farm prices in all the history of agriculture. Out of this panic it is that the Manufacturers Record figures the $32,000,000,000 of agricultural deflation and that estimate is not far different from the Department of Agriculture figures. The same authority says other business was deflated about $18,000,000,000. At that time other business was three times agriculture. Since the deflation it is seven times agriculture. Agriculture was deflated more than other business because it was deferred until October, when the crops were wholly matured and were ready for market, so they were able to deflate agriculture about six times as much in proportion as the average of all other business. That is not a fair statement to business either, because that $18,000,000,000 of other business fell mostly on the little business of the country. Big business largely protected itself through the special favor of the credits which I have outlined here.

Mr. President, that action threw agriculture down into the depression then. Agricultural depression began at that time and has not revived since. Some slight improvement has been made, but nothing of any substantial nature. Other business revived in 1922 through its control of the credit of the country, including even the credit, the deposits of the farmers themselves, through its collection of them into this banking system mainly over in New York, and it was able to put on the great inflation and greatest financial bubble in 1929 the world has ever known. That bubble burst, and that hit all business, including agriculture, and drove agriculture still deeper into the depression, where it had been in for nine years.

That is not all that affected agriculture in the depression. Under the tariff system which we are discussing here now the protected industry fixes the price of its product at the factory without foreign competition. It can at least raise its price to the top of the tariff rate before a foreigner can compete with it at all. But what about agriculture? It has a little surplus, only about 10 per cent of what it produces, and that little surplus must be sold by the farmer in the domestic market. He is not financed, so he can separate and segregate it from the domestic market. Agriculture is the only business in the United States so situated. Every other business that has an exportable surplus is financed under our system and does separate and segregate its surplus from the domestic market and never even offers it for sale in the domestic market, and then obtains for it the best price it can in the best world market, and nearly always they take a less price and a less profit, even when there are antidumping laws, then they charge the people of the United States.

But here is the farmer forced to sell the domestic demand, and the surplus, too, in the domestic market, and that floods the domestic market. That flood breaks down his tariff rates. We can talk about tariff rates and giving the farmer aid under the tariff rates of the Smoot-Hawley bill, but they are mere scraps of paper so far as benefiting him. Something else is necessary to make those rates effective. So the surplus, breaking down the tariff protection, flows over into the free-trade markets of the world and is sold in competition with all the world. The price fixed by that sale is cabled back to the board of trade or to the cotton exchange or the produce exchange in a few minutes and then the price of his whole product is fixed the same as the free-trade foreign price less the freight and expense of reaching that market.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senate from Michigan?

Mr. BROOKHART. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think, of course, there is no doubt about the Senator's philosophy that with the surplus it is impossible for the tariff to affect prices. I was wondering what the Senator's view was as to whether or not, aside from the question of fixing prices, there was any advantage to the American farmer in, for instance, the tariff on wheat.

Mr. BROOKHART. The tariff on wheat during 1929, after we passed the Farm Board bill, was no advantage at all. Wheat sold at 15 to 18 cents higher at Winnipeg all through the marketing season of that year than it did at Minneapolis. I checked the quotations day after day. The tariff was absolutely of no advantage on wheat at that time. But as soon as the Farm Board was set up to buy a part of the surplus they did get some benefit out of the tariff protection. Nobody in Canada would be fool enough to send wheat to the United States when he could get 15 to 18 cents more in his own country. That was the situation.

I know a banker at Humboldt, Iowa, who had a farm at Portal, N. Dak. Portal is on the Canadian line and North Portal is across the line in Canada. In 1929 when he harvested his wheat he hauled it across the line and sold it in Canada. He paid 12 cents a bushel tariff to the Canadian Government, and a dollar a load in addition, and had 9 cents a bushel left more than he was offered for the same wheat the same day on his own side of the street.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is continuing to discuss the question of price. I am asking, aside from the question of price, whether the tariff does not give an advantage to the farmer in retaining for him the domestic market.

Mr. BROOKHART. It is not much advantage to maintain the domestic market if it is forced down to the rest of the world market. It is a wrong premise to say that it retains the domestic market for him. It does not. It forces him down to the level of the world market anyhow; so he has, in fact, no domestic market.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But whatever that world level may be, would he not have less opportunity to sell his wheat in his home market at the world price if he did not have the tariff around him?

Mr. BROOKHART. I can not say that he would. It seems to me that the world price is fixed by the exports from all countries, and the tariff does not affect it one way or the other. So I can not see any force in the Senator's suggestion from that standpoint.

Mr. President, the situation under our tariff laws which gives to industry the special privilege and advantage of raising its prices under tariff protection, while the farmer must accept the prices for his product which are fixed by the free-trade markets of the world, constitutes a discrimination against agriculture that adds to the agricultural depression. The patent laws operate the same way and are a complete monopoly.

I want to mention one other contributing factor to the situation, and that is our corporation laws. Under the corporation laws capital has been combined into great units. Most of the corporation laws now are State laws; most of the corporations are created by the States. However, they are permitted to go into interstate and foreign commerce, and such commerce is under the control of the Congress of the United States. Since a corporation has no existence except what the law gives it, and the law is enacted by the sovereignty of the people, I maintain that that sovereignty has the right to dictate to a corporation the kind of life it shall lead and the amount of profits it shall earn for having been created a corporation. Further, when a corporation goes into interstate and foreign commerce, which are channels of trade for the benefit of all the people, and are under the control of Congress, Congress should dictate whether it be a National or a State corporation, what kind of a life it shall lead in that domain, and should fix the profit it shall charge in view of the privilege accorded it of being a corporation and of operating in interstate and foreign commerce, the domain of all the people.

However, Mr. President, Congress has not done that; it has not said one word to the corporations about what profits they shall charge. We enact antitrust laws, which are not enforced, but they are not based upon the theory that we shall control the profits of incorporated companies. So corporations come in just like birds of prey and charge "what the traffic will bear." That puts us in a constant state of economic warfare in our country, and in that warfare, according to Hon. George Wharton Pepper, a former distinguished Member in this Chamber, 92 per cent of American business ultimately fails even in ordinary times; and this depression is going to increase that percentage considerably. There is something radically wrong with a system that is faced with 92 per cent failure even before it gets off its own doorstep.

Mr. President, from this outline it is evident that agriculture went down in depression in 1920; that it has stayed down, and it is now going deeper down. I say to the Senate that we can not strike down agriculture in that way, strike down one-third of the buying power of the American people, and almost entirely destroy its credit, without bringing on a general depression in the United States. So the greatest cause of the depression, greater than the war loans which we made, greater than all of the other causes, is the fact that agriculture's buying power was destroyed, mainly by the discriminations and special privileges which were given to other institutions in our country by laws. That condition, long continued, finally broke the credit of agriculture; stopped the wheels of industry; turned many men out of employment, which in turn broke down their buying power, which, in turn, stopped other wheels of industry, until there were no wheels turning except for the production of the bare necessities, and much of that was based upon charity, to 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 idle workers in the United States.

Mr. President, if my analysis of the present situation is correct, we have begun at the wrong place in an endeavor to get out of the existing depression. It was big business, in its grasping, that put us down into this depression and big business is not going to lift us out of it. Last year the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. had the greatest earnings in all its history, but it discharged thousands of its men.

A couple of weeks ago the president of the University of Maryland asked me to attend a vesper service at his university chapel. He said Rabbi Israel, of Baltimore, would speak at that service and that he was worth hearing. I went and the rabbi was worth hearing. Here is one of the things he told us that night. A big utility company of Baltimore—I do not recollect its name—set aside for depreciation in 1931 a million dollars more than its actual depreciation. It also set aside another million dollars for surplus. It further declared a 14 per cent dividend on its stock, but it discharged a thousand of its men. One of those men, who had worked for that company for 18 years at a bare living wage, within two months of his discharge was unable to pay his gas bill, and they shut off the gas. That is the attitude of big business, and there are some 173 other combinations in the United States in a similar situation to the two which I have just described.

But, Mr. President, there is another line of evidence as to the condition of big business in this depression which I wish to present. I think all the boys in the press gallery and all the expert financial writers obtain information about financial affairs for their newspapers all over the country, and their stories are published for the information of the public in general. However, the information that is given out in that way is not founded upon the facts, except when some committee of the House or Senate digs them out in investigations, or something of that kind. The big newspapers and big business men have their private correspondents; they have another set of reporters who write them confidential letters, and those letters tell them as nearly as it is possible what is the actual situation of things. Occasionally I get hold of one of those confidential letters. I have one here reviewing the 1931 period. The letter is dated January 25, 1932, and I want to read what it says about the year 1931:

> The most challenging economic statistics of the depression are that, in spite of the fact that production volume and wage payments have gone down together to barely more than half of the pre-war depression volume, the grand total of interest and dividend payments—

We know that many stocks have been changed into bonds and the holders get interest instead of dividends—

> The grand total of interest and dividend payments has been maintained higher than for any year prior to 1929.

How many of the newspaper boys get that sort of information about the big business of this country and let the people really know what happens in the lines of big business? Then again—

> Even the dividend payments of railroads this year—> have exceeded those for 1928 and for any previous year in railroad history.

That was 1931—

Still the newspapers are filled with weird stories of the poverty of the railroads, and we had a demand for a 15 per cent rate advance. We were not able to defeat that demand entirely, but we did defeat it so far as it applied to rates on agricultural products.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator think that the practice of sending out private statements of the kind to which he has referred is general or is quite limited?

Mr. BROOKHART. I think among the big businesses of the country it is quite general. It is not general so far as the common folk are concerned.

Mr. FESS. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to say further—and I scarcely know whether I ought to make the statement or not—that an article was shown me by a very distinguished representative of a great newspaper and I was permitted to read it. To the article the reporter had attached a little memorandum to this effect, "I have written this article in accordance with your views and the policy of the paper, but the facts are as I state them in the memorandum," and they were entirely different. Does the Senator suppose that is very general?

Mr. BROOKHART. I hope not, but I am afraid since we entered upon the investigation of the Wall Street crowd and obtained the checks that were paid to writers for writing impartial news, that there is not much of it impartial. I am very fearful that that is so.

Mr. President, from this description, I do not think big business will help us out of this depression. Big business has taken care of itself pretty well, even in the depression. The railroads had $4,500,000,000 of surplus proved beyond any controversy whatever. They have enough for dividends for several years if they care to use it for that purpose.

The speculative line of big business, of course, will be able to make immense profits out of the depression by the control of credit and by the use of surplus funds to buy back properties at their present low prices. To-day in the Banking and Currency Committee it was revealed that a company promoted the selling of its stock—I refer to the Warner Bros. outfit—at a high figure; it employed some expert writers to give expert advice to the country, and sold, as I recollect, some two or three hundred thousand shares at a high price through promotion activities, and then turned around, beat the price down, and bought that same stock back and retained all the profits. Such are the schemes of big business throughout the United States. That is why big business is not opposed to depression. Big business wants depression.

Colonel Ayres, the noted statistician, I think the most noted statistician in the United States, who served as statistician of the United States Army during the war, has prepared a chart of American business covering 50 years. I had the chart placed on the wall of the Senate Chamber not long ago. That chart shows that in 50 years we have had eight major depressions in the United States. Through the middle of the chart there runs a straight line representing the normal level of business. When business was booming the tracing line of course rose up above the normal and when business was depressed it dropped down below normal.

When Colonel Ayres was before the committee, I myself asked him how many major depressions we had had during the last 50 years, and presented to him his own chart. He counted them up and said, "Eight major ones, and then there were seven other little ones thrown in for good measure." I then asked him how much of the time business had been on a normal level during the last 50 years. He hesitated, and then I told him that I had made the computation that I could not find 30 minutes during the whole 50 years when business had been on the normal level. He admitted that that was about right; that we were either climbing up into inflation or dropping down into depression.

In the last few days a new financial deal has been organized to bring back prosperity, it is said. It is like some of the others we had. First we had a moratorium. That was to bring back prosperity. For a few days it boomed stocks. Then we had the National Credit Corporation. It put on a big bluff and started a little stock boom for a few days, and then it faded out. Then finally, when Congress assembled, Congress took a hand, and we created the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I think the Senator from Utah must have regarded that as a Budget-balancing institution, because the first thing it did was to appropriate $500,000,000 out of the United States Treasury.

What was the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for? It had $500,000,000 of direct appropriation and $1,500,000,000 of liability of the Treasury on bonds. That money was to be loaned to these railroads that declared more dividends in 1931 than any year of their history except 1929; and it was to be loaned to these big banks that had some bonds and other stuff frozen up in railroads and perhaps in some foreign and other institutions.

The bill creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation did not provide in the beginning for any loans to closed banks, and we had quite a contest over that matter. Mr. Traylor, of Chicago, came in and said we needed $500,000,000 for that purpose; that that would do more good than any other part of the functions of the corporation, because it would relieve people who were actually in distress and who had their deposits and their savings tied up in these closed banks. We lost out in the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, and we lost out on the floor of the Senate, and the bill passed without any provision whatever for the relief of closed banks in the United States. I voted against the bill in that form.

I then interviewed the House committee, and Mr. Traylor did likewise. The House committee listened to us better, and they put in the bill those amendments providing for the relief of closed banks. That called for a conference, and when the conference met Mr. Eugene Meyer showed up in opposition to that part of the bill. Because of his opposition we were finally compelled to compromise and got a limit of $200,000,000 for closed banks.

I want to say, however, that Mr. Eugene Meyer as administrator has made that provision almost valueless. He has made only a few loans. We got one through out in Iowa after appealing to General Dawes and raising a general row all along the line. It is approved. I have a letter to that effect from the general this morning. But Mr. Meyer, following his policy in the old War Finance Corporation, following his policy in the land-bank system of a general restriction of credit, and his policy with reference to the intermediate credit bank system, has not used those funds and has not brought to the country the relief it demands. The result is that agricultural prices are lower and the agricultural depression is deeper at this moment than it was when we passed the bill back in February.

That is not helping us out. Loans have been made to some 200 banks out in my State. That has helped those banks temporarily. It has postponed the day when they will be forced to close; but if hogs stay at 2.75 cents or 3 cents a pound and corn at 23 cents a bushel, they will not be able to pay their loans or interest, either, to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation when they come due. Instead of curing the depression, that sort of thing is only delaying it and digging a deeper pit in which we will fall at the end of the time.

What can be done to end the depression? No ordinary thing will do it. Agriculture was put down by laws of the Congress in its discriminations in railroad rates, in the administration of the Federal reserve system, and, to some extent, in the very law of the system itself, which forces over into New York the surplus credit of the country over and above the reserves; by the tariff laws, which fix the farmer's price in the free-trade markets of the world; by the patent laws and by the corporation laws that create these combinations against agriculture and against every other independent business in the country.

Those are the things that have gradually forced this deep depression upon us. Add to that the gigantic speculative operations in the stock exchange and in the boards of trade, and we have the present situation; and it has gone beyond the calculations of any financial crowd in this country. They themselves have lost control, and every move they have made has turned out and gone in the wrong direction from what they predicted. Besides, they are not inclined to risk their own fortunes any farther than they have to in order to end this depression.

Notwithstanding that, Mr. President, last year, in 1931, we had a national income of $60,000,000,000. That is the estimate of the National Industrial Conference Board by their representative before the Banking and Currency Committee, and I think it is a sound analysis of the situation. Sixty billion dollars means $2,500 for every average family in the United States. In 1930 we had a national income of $71,000,000,000, and that means about $2,800 for each average family in the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. KING. A year or two ago I attempted to discover the basis upon which those figures were predicated; and I was never able to satisfy myself, though I had a conference with one of the representatives of the organization just referred to. I was wondering if the Senator does not think that those figures are rather speculative and are not founded upon real facts.

I assume from what I have learned that they took for granted that though a farmer's profits at the end of the year might be nil, his income was two or three or four thousand dollars, based upon what they supposed he and his family were worth in the daily labor that they performed upon the farm. Carrying the same principle into all of the activities and industries, it seemed to me that they reached a fictitious and altogether unsound basis upon which to predicate the figures which they submitted.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator is mistaken about that. The estimate does not represent the net income. It is rather a gross income that it represents.

Mr. KING. I understand.

Mr. BROOKHART. But I think it is as accurate an estimate as it is possible to make of income in the United States or anywhere. The farmer had some income, even if he does not have enough to pay his expenses and taxes. Everybody has some income; and sixty billions of gross income, if it were distributed out, would keep our wheels of industry going. It would maintain our buying power so that we would not have this depression at all. I think it is all a question of distribution.

In our prosperous years the national income ran eighty-five or eighty-six billion dollars. So with $60,000,000,000 of income we had enough resources to correct the situation; but there is just one institution in our country that is big enough and has power enough to do it to mobilize those resources, and that is the Government of the United States.

"Oh, yes; but," you say, "that puts the Government into business." Well, that old slogan is what put Harding in as President. We had too much government in business and not enough business in government, he said. So Harding came in, and we put business in government, with Daugherty and Fall and Mellon and Eugene Meyer. That is the way we got business into government, and this is the result. The result of this business in government is the depression.

I am ready now to try the other method. What is the best thing in our civilization, anyhow? I think it will be conceded that it is the public-school system—a government institution, mostly by the States, but by the United States in the District of Columbia and in the Territories and in the Canal Zone.

What is the next best thing in our civilization? I think the next best thing is the public-road system. There is a little element yet of business in government in toll bridges, but we will get rid of that by and by. It is a government system, promoted by the States and the Government of the United States, though the Government of the United States is not paying its just share.

What is the next business? I think the post-office system is the next. I think it is the most efficient business of its magnitude in the world to-day. Notwithstanding the discrepancies that the Senator from Utah and others have pointed out in it, it is still the most efficient business in our whole country. Why, the salary of that one man Grace in the Bethlehem Steel Co. represents more inefficiency than you can find, probably, in half of the whole Post Office Department—a $12,000 salary and a bonus of $1,750,000 on the side! That is the inefficiency of big business in its operation in grabbing the profits and the earnings of the people through these various sources.

If any of the newspaper boys in the press gallery represent the newspapers that are fighting me and cartooning me up, I have something for them in regard to the Post Office Department. These papers that fight me out in my own State—and that is most of them—say the Post Office Department is not efficient because it has a deficit. I checked into it to see where that deficit comes from, and I find that over $100,000,000 of it, the big end of all of it, is on second-class mail matter, because the Government is carrying these newspapers at such a low rate that it does not pay the expense of carrying them. I propose that we raise that rate on all these profiteering newspapers. Their managers and their cartoonists get bigger salaries than a United States Senator, a good deal bigger. I should like to reduce them down to the salary of a Senator, though. I should like to tax them right down. I enjoy using the taxing power in that way; but I should also like to raise the rates on all those profiteering papers. We will exempt the little fellows that can not make anything; but the big ones ought to pay the cost of carriage of their papers.

A Congressman said to me, "We can not do that. Why," he said, "they will go into the express, and we will lose the business entirely." I told him, however, that over in the Senate we knew how to levy a tax on the express carriage of second-class mail matter so as to keep the newspapers in the mails, and there would be no trouble about doing that. So that is one little relief that we can put on that will help out in that way and help to balance the Budget.

But, Mr. President, there are big things that need to be done, that need to be done now, that are a thousand times, ten thousand times more important than the rate on lumber, or the rate on oil, or the rate on copper, or the rate on coal, on which we are spending so much time. These other things are a thousand times more important, and they need the immediate action of the Senate and of the Congress.

The first of these is to give the farmer a governmental set-up with enough funds and enough authority to handle his exportable surplus at a cost-of-production price, so that the home market will rise to that level and the buying power of agriculture—a third of the American people—can be restored, and that can be done in one day. That was done in 1919 and 1917, and it worked successfully, and it can be done now. It will require some amendments to the Farm Board law, which I will discuss a moment later in connection with the bill which has been proposed by the farm organizations.

If we will provide the funds and the authority, many of the wheels of industry will start, some of the furniture factories over in Grand Rapids can be opened up, at least, and the same will be true of factories all over the United States. That is the first step toward a sound restoration of prosperity. That is vastly different from reconstruction finance loans to railroads, whose traffic will not increase because of the loans, or to banks, whose day of closing will only be postponed. This is at the foundation and the bottom of things.

The next thing that is necessary to do is to provide Government funds and authority to start Government works enough to employ the unemployed. We do not need to employ all of the unemployed of the country, but enough of them so that they will send their orders out into private business, and in the end that will result in the employment of all the unemployed labor of this country.

Mr. President, where will we get the money to do this thing? We can get the money by another perfectly sound operation in the stabilization of the dollar itself. I think nobody denies now—I think everybody sees—that the standard of value has gone too high and has put the prices of all commodities down too low. So something is necessary to stabilize that money standard at this time.

I think that if we would issue a billion dollars to the Farm Board of Treasury notes to get the money, that would be enough. The chairman of the Farm Board said $1,000,000,000, with what they have already, would take care of the exportable surplus of agriculture at this time. That would have a tendency in itself to lower the money standard of value and to raise the prices of all commodities, which need it so much, and it would help all commodities, as well as farm commodities, but farm commodities have fallen more than other commodities and would probably be helped more.

I have here a chart that was presented to the Committee on Banking and Currency showing what has happened to all the various commodities since 1929, and we find that the prices received by the farmers—not those that are paid by the customers after the middlemen's profits are added, but the prices received by the farmers—have declined very much more than the prices of any other commodities in the United States.

Economists tell us that if we cheapen the money standard, it will increase the price of those things which have gone lowest more, in proportion, than the prices of other commodities, and that will help agriculture a little more than the other businesses of the country.

Mr. President, I do not believe that a billion dollars of Treasury note issues will restore a normal price level in the United States, but I think that if two or three billion more were issued for the starting of public works and the employment of the unemployed, that would bring us back to a normal, or somewhere near a normal, price level in the United States.

We have a guide; everybody but the Federal Reserve Board considers it a scientific guide by which to gage and measure the issue of Treasury notes. We have $346,000,000 of those Treasury notes, which came over from the Civil War. They are just as good money as we know to-day, those old greenbacks, and they are in circulation now, and our Government, with its $60,000,000,000 national income in depression, eighty-five or ninety billion dollars in time of prosperity, is better able now to sustain a Treasury issue of $5,000,000,000 or $10,000,000,000 than it was the $346,000,000 at the close of the Civil War, when our Government was almost broken down. Is it not a sensible thing to do? Why should we cling to this fetish of an arbitrary money standard, when it destroys our prosperity? We were told that the gold standard put us on a basis of eternal prosperity, and we have been in depression every few years since, with ups and downs, because the standard itself is a subject of speculation, and that has contributed largely to bringing on the various depressions.

How do we generally balance the Budget? Of course, in ordinary times there is no doubt that it ought to be balanced by tax levies. Everybody will concede that. But in war times we do not balance it that way, nor should we in emergencies of any kind. In war times we balance it with some twenty-four or twenty-five billion dollars of bond issues, and those bond issues are a heavier burden upon the Government than a Treasury-note issue; and why? There are two reasons for that. First, the bond issue carries an interest rate, and that is an extra burden on the taxing power of the Government. There is no other thing behind a bond issue except the taxing power of the Government. That is the one thing upon which it can rest. A Treasury-note issue has the same support, and is less burden to carry. So it would be sounder and easier to maintain than bonds, and besides, the Treasury notes have a legal tender power, which also is a great help in sustaining their par value.

Mr. President, there is nothing unsound in the situation. It is just a question of reasoning it out according to plain common sense, and we can go ahead and issue Treasury notes in these depressions until our price level is restored, and then we can stop, and the Treasury can be required to expand and contract so as to maintain a normal price level. That will stop the ups and downs of business in our country and contribute greatly toward a stable business, which we do not have under the present system.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator think there is any limit to which it would be necessary to confine ourselves in these Treasury note issues?

Mr. BROOKHART. I certainly do.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What would be the Senator's limit?

Mr. BROOKHART. The limit would be when the labor index of commodity prices reaches what they call the normal level. The 1926 level is generally taken as normal.

Mr. VANDENBERG. How much currency issue would be permitted at the present time on that basis?

Mr. BROOKHART. It would be impossible to tell exactly, but we could start with one billion, and see its effect, and then we could issue another billion, and in a short time we would find out what the effect would be. I know how those values fluctuate. The first day I was in Berlin I bought 57,000 marks for a dollar. The last day I was there I bought 80,000 marks for a dollar, and I know that prices change if the money is inflated in that way. If the inflation is in less proportion, the change would be in less proportion.

In Russia they were transacting their business on the chervontzi basis, but they had no money printed. That was the standard, and it was practically Irving Fisher's standard, and the combining of commodity prices.

When I came to pay my hotel bill, it amounted to so many of the chervontzi things, and they translated them into the depreciated rubles, and I paid 4,164,000,000 rubles for five days' lodging and six meals.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Senator will yield further, he has referred to the postwar German mark. I have in my hand a German bank note for 100,000,000,000 marks, which would have had a presumptive face value in 1923 of about $25,000,000,000. In other words, this would have paid the entire American national debt on that basis. This hundred billion marks ultimately stabilized at 2½ cents. The total issue ran to 486 quintillion—a figure with 18 ciphers. The danger in starting such a system is that it never stops. I assume that the Senator is not talking about any system in America which would lead in any such direction as that.

Mr. BROOKHART. No, indeed. I am talking about a system which can be sustained by the taxing power of the Government of the United States.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I was wondering where the Senator would place the taxes and how we would hold them intact to take care of the currency.

Mr. BROOKHART. As I said before the Senator came in, I think, there are $346,000,000 of Treasury notes now that do not need any tax behind them. They are going right along, and have done so since the Civil War. They depreciated because they were not made full legal tender in the beginning, but since they were brought up, they have been at par ever since.

The only way we can sustain money or get gold is by using the taxing power. I think the commodity index published now by the Department of Labor is a sound guide which we can follow for Treasury issues, which we did not use to have, even at the time of the Civil War, and gaging our issues to that, figuring out what the normal level is, and stopping when we reach that, and expanding and contracting to stay as near to that as possible, I think is the soundest basis of any money system

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the Senator is willing to leave this to all the weaknesses of human nature in figuring the commodity level.

Mr. BROOKHART. What is the present system left to?

Mr. COUZENS. It is left to a general average of people and not to one class.

Mr. BROOKHART. This Government ought to be made up of the general average of people. It ought to really represent the people.

Mr. COUZENS. That is what I am afraid is the matter with the Senate.

Mr. BROOKHART. That it does not do that?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. I agree with the Senator in that. If it did represent the people, we would have had this depression cured long ago. Since they listened to the powers which have overthrown prosperity and bring on these inflations and depressions and call them cycles and all that sort of thing, we are in our troubles and going deeper still.

Mr. COUZENS. I think the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] could straighten that out, with his long experience in finance and his good will.

Mr. BROOKHART. He might need some help.

Mr. President, when Colonel Ayres was before the Committee on Banking and Currency, I asked him, "Have we reached the bottom of this depression?" He said, "No," and almost with tears in his voice. There is no doubt about the honesty, integrity, intelligence, and ability of his answer. He probably knows this situation better than any other statistician in all our country. Then I asked him how long it would take us to come out of the depression after we did reach bottom, and he said, "It will certainly take longer than it did to get in."

I am sorry to see the Senator from Michigan has left the Chamber, because I want to say to him that that is the sentence of big business upon the people of this country. We are sentenced and condemned now to go down deeper into the depression and then to stay longer than we have already been in before they promise us any prosperity at all.

Do we have to serve that sentence? I do not think so. I think that if we will pass the bill which the farm organizations have presented we will begin at once to get away from the depression.

One trouble with the farm bills has been that there has always been disagreement among the farm organizations, which came with different plans and different remedies. Even when the McNary-Haugen bill was passed the Grange did not approve it. But at last the farm organizations have agreed upon a bill, and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] has introduced it, and it has been ordered reported by the committee, and will be reported soon.

That bill is not entirely adequate in all its features, but the Senate can amend it and make it thoroughly adequate. It does not provide, to my mind, a way for raising the money necessary to handle the exportable surplus as speedily as it ought to be done and as certainly as it ought to be done.

I would amend that by issuing enough Treasury notes to take care of the exportable surplus. Then I would want to make it safe so it might be financed under any conditions by providing that it ought to have authority to borrow such other money as it might need.

This was all done by a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress on the recommendation of Herbert Hoover and Julius H. Barnes, of the United States Chamber of Commerce, in 1919, after the war was over. There is not a thing in the recommendations that I am making that was not enacted into law and passed and worked successfully in handling the wheat surplus of 1919.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am rather curious to know, in view of our tariff policy which contemplates as we are proceeding an ultimate embargo upon all imports, how we are going to find markets for our exportable farm products? The people of the world may be hungry for our farm products, but they have no gold with which to pay for them; and if we put up an embargo tariff and refuse to receive their products or services in payment for things we ship abroad, obviously there will be no transactions.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator is right in that regard. I think there should be some method devised by which they could buy our products; the stabilization of the dollar would help that situation. Upon that point, however, they are not going to buy anything from us except what they have to buy. In view of our tariff policy they are fully justified in retaliating against us as they are doing. However, they do have to buy these food products. There has never been a six or seven year period in the history of the world when there was not a world demand that would use up all the agricultural products, including cotton, the greatest exportable item of all.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BROOKHART. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. Did I understand the Senator from Iowa to say that a new bill designated as the McNary-Haugen bill is about to be reported for agricultural relief?

Mr. BROOKHART. The three great national farm organizations—the Union, the Bureau, and the Grange—appeared before the Senate committee and formulated the bill. The committee have approved it and ordered it reported, and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] has told me he will report it soon.

Mr. LEWIS. I would like the Senator from Iowa to give me his view as to whether the present new bill meets the objections of President Coolidge when he vetoed the previous bill? Are the elements of the present bill so stated as to avoid the objections made by the President of the United States when he vetoed the bill?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not know that they will avoid those objections. I think we have more of that same kind of objections in this bill, because this is a better bill than the other one was. The objections made to that bill were not sound as I look at the situation. This bill is a pretty good bill and will go a long ways toward handling the exportable surplus at a cost-of-production price. It is a price-fixing bill and nothing else will accomplish the purpose.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator did not approve the reasons advanced by President Coolidge and President Hoover for the veto of the farm bills previously?

Mr. BROOKHART. No. I interviewed President Coolidge myself and tried to change his opinion on the subject, but he would rather talk to me about rifle shooting than about a farm bill.

Here are the amendments I would suggest to the bill. First, I think the Farm Board should have funds enough. That is the first necessity for handling anything, and the exportable surplus can be handled with $1,000,000,000 more than they have now. The chairman of the board himself said so before the committee. I would provide these funds so they could go to work at once. That is not provided directly in the bill.

Then I would give them authority to borrow more. One little item in the bill puts a duty on cotton. I think that should be dropped out in the Senate and let the House put it in the bill for constitutional reasons; but I think it should go in the bill, though it is not high enough.

Then I think the debenture rates in the bill are too low. They ought properly to be about double and some of them more than that.

I shall not take the time now to discuss the bill in any detail. Oats should be named specifically. It is more important even than wheat. It is left out and has such a small exportable surplus that it is easy to handle. The whole exportable surplus is a little over 50 per cent of cotton, which is the big one and the hard one to handle, but that 50 per cent or more of cotton is about 65 per cent of the world demand for cotton, so if it is financed adequately and held back we will have something to say about the world price of cotton which we do not have now with 40 or 50 outfits exporting cotton and competing with each other in selling cotton.

Next is wheat, about 20 per cent. We have had some little experience with handling wheat. Then comes corn, less than 1 per cent; oats, less than 1 per cent; and livestock products, only 7 or 8 per cent. If those small percentages were handled, the surplus problem would be settled as to those items.

Mr. President, in conclusion, let me say that the Congress ought not to adjourn or think of adjourning until it has given the farmers this cost-of-production price for their products, as both political parties have promised in their platforms. It ought not to adjourn until unemployed labor is provided with jobs. I say to a country with $60,000,000,000 of national income in a time of depression and $80,000,000,000 to $90,000,000,000 of national income in time of prosperity that it owes a job to every man who will work. That done, we should then correct the dollar so the man who owes debts can pay them in the same money standard in which they were contracted. Now, those debts must all be paid in a money standard that is two or three times the value of the money when they were contracted.

If we will stabilize the dollar by Treasury-note issues and bring its value down so that the debts can be paid in the same level of values where they were contracted, that will also help to stabilize the situation.

Those three things will give us a genuine prosperity. If the Congress adjourns without doing those three things, it is going to be unsafe for many Members of Congress to return to their homes.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a statement in support of an excise tax on phosphate rock issued by Martin H. Grace.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF AN EXCISE TAX ON PHOSPHATE ROCK

IMPORTS OF PHOSPHATE, 1926–1930

The importations of phosphate rock into the United States, 1926–1930, as taken from statistics published February 3, 1932, by the United States Department of Commerce in Phosphate Rock in 1930 (Bertrand L. Johnson), were as follows:

	Long tons	Value
1926	17,378	$192,611
1927	28,195	292,871
1928	45,812	431,238
1929	44,899	469,171
1930	32,658	377,177

CONDITIONS IN THE UNITED STATES

The phosphate industry is active in Florida, Tennessee, Idaho, Wyoming, and Montana, with invested capital of $67,000,000 and furnishing employment directly to 3,500 or 4,000 men, with sales in 1930 of 3,926,392 tons, at a value of $13,996,830. The entire product was carried by the railroads, thereby adding substantially $6,000,000 to their revenue. Coastwise vessels, which by law must be registered under the United States flag, transported about 1,500,000 tons and benefited to the extent of more than $2,500,000.

GENERAL

The principal threat to the American phosphate industry is in the operations in the French protectorate of Morocco, where the Moroccan Government exercises a monopoly in the production and sale of phosphate rock, employing Arab labor, who are paid wages of about 25 cents a day. The material is transported from the mines over Government-owned railroads to Government docks at the port, and the total cost of mining, drying, refining, and transporting figures up to $2.80 per gross ton free on dock Casablanca, Morocco, at which point it is placed aboard vessels at a cost for wharfage and handling of less than one-fifth of the sum paid in the equivalent Florida ports.

Moroccan phosphate is of high quality, approximately equal to the highest quality produced in the United States, for which quality the United States enjoys at present a market for something less than 1,000,000 tons. The cost of production for this quality in the United States is approximately 70 per cent higher than the cost of the more widely used lower grades. The cost of the Moroccan high-grade production f. o. b. Casablanca is just about the same as the bare operating cost of the American lower grades, without including anything for amortization, interest on capital, and taxes, which items the foreign Government owned monopoly escapes.

At a lower unit cost the high-grade article will displace the lower grades entirely—this has been the history of all phosphate business.

The importance of the Moroccan threat to the American industry can be judged not only by the comparative cost of the foreign and the American article but also by—

(a) Size of the Moroccan operation and its rate of growth, and
(b) Morocco's marketing policy.

SIZE OF THE OPERATION AND ITS RATE OF GROWTH

The Moroccan operations commenced in 1921, in which year 8,100 tons was produced and sold. In the year 1930, 1,779,000 tons was produced and sold.

MARKETING POLICY

The policy of the Moroccan Government monopoly is to dominate the high-grade markets of the world at any price. This was shown prior to the time when sterling went off gold by Morocco's prices, which in places where they were seeking to establish themselves, such as Japan, Australia, South Africa, and the United States, bore no relation to prices in Europe where they are established. Subsequent to the drop in the gold value of the pound sterling, Morocco reduced her price to Europe from an average of $7.58 per ton, as found by the experts of the United States Treasury Department, to a level of about $5 to $5.25 per ton f. o. b. Casablanca. At the same time her price to Japan, which was $4.50 per ton f. o. b. Casablanca when England and Japan were on the gold basis, has been reduced almost correspondingly.

It might perhaps be argued that this drop in gold prices was to meet the drop in gold prices of phosphate produced in nongold countries, but an examination of world production indicates that the total 1930 production in countries that are now nongold countries was 1,091,415 tons out of a total of 10,614,701 tons, or 10 per cent.

Another factor that may have affected Morocco's decision was that 75 per cent of the production in nongold countries, or over 900,000 tons, was what is known in the trade as high-grade phosphate of the same general quality as Morocco, and of which the United States produces less than 1,000,000 tons per annum.

The newly established level of European prices for Morocco will render our claim of dumping, which was heretofore just and fair, nugatory and useless, while the low ocean freight rates now available will enable Morocco to land her product in United States ports for even less money than the $7 per ton heretofore protested. As will be seen in Phosphate Rock in 1930, heretofore quoted, the asking price for 75 per cent pebble phosphate f. o. b. mines is $5.50. To bring this to a competitive point like Baltimore one must add rail freight and terminal charges of $1.20 (the railroads are now moving to increase this to $1.44), vessel freight, loading and discharging costs of $1.75, or a total of $8.45, which with the newly proposed railroad freight increase will be $8.69.

MOROCCO IMPORTATION TO THE UNITED STATES

When Morocco commenced importations to the United States in 1927 at a price of $4 a ton f. o. b. Casablanca the American miners resorted to the antidumping provisions of the tariff law and upon application the Secretary of the Treasury found dumping as per his decision of February 9, 1928, which said:

"After due investigation I find that phosphate rock from Morocco is being sold in the United States at less than its fair value and that the industry of mining and selling phosphate rock in the United States has been, and is likely to be, injured by reason of the importation of phosphate rock into the United States from Morocco."

Since this decision the matter has been in litigation and will come for final review and decision before the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals at the October term of court this year.

From the history of the case, from a knowledge of the economic situation in Morocco and the rest of the world, from their estimate of the intention of Morocco to seize the market that United States producers now enjoy for approximately 1,000,000 tons of high-grade phosphate, from the knowledge of the marketing policy of the Moroccan Government monopoly as observed throughout the world, it is the universal opinion of the miners of American phosphates that the handing down of the court's decision, whether favorable to the contentions of the Americans or the reverse, will be the signal for the deferred fulfillment of contracts previously made in this country looking to a movement of 200,000 tons and the placing of such other and further contracts as will deprive the American producers of their market and affect not only the production of a million tons of high-grade phosphate in the United States but every ton of phosphate produced by American miners of no matter what grade by the reduction of the whole body of the price schedules. The destruction of the entire industry will surely follow the destruction of values in the leading quality. The pro rata declines in the price of lower-grade qualities which must inevitably follow will render it an impossibility for any of the American mines to operate, so that we take into view the possibility of Morocco phosphate entirely supplanting the American product.

WHAT PLANS HAS MOROCCO MADE TO SUPPLY THIS POTENTIAL DEMAND?

The productive capacity of the present installations at Khouriga based on the port of Casablanca, Morocco, is 2,500,000 tons per annum plus 1,000,000 tons already mined ready for shipment. For the past several years the Moroccan Government have been building up a new port known as Safi and has been constructing a new railroad from this port to new phosphate mines at Louis Gentil. The phosphate monopoly is active prosecuting the work at this new mine for the erection of a plant that will be capable of producing an output duplicating that of the mines at Khouriga. Consequently it can be seen that the French Government has already taken adequate steps in contemplation of the invasion of this market. The railroad from the new mines to the junction at Ben Guerir with the existing railway will be completed in 60 days.

WHAT ECONOMIC ADVANTAGES CAN BE DERIVED BY THE IMPOSITION OF AN EXCISE TAX?

The primary economic advantage to be derived is the maintenance of present operations in the mining of phosphate rock in the several States of Florida, Tennessee, Montana, Idaho, and Wyoming. Assuming that 4,000 workmen would be thrown out of work by the cessation of this mining and upon the basis of five persons to a family, this would amount to 20,000 people whose means of support would be taken away from them should phosphate-mining operations in the United States cease, besides the collateral effect upon the railroads and the coastwise vessels and upon those who supply raw materials consumed in the mining operations, such as machinery, electric power, fuel oil, etc.

The miners of phosphate in this country, who as aforesaid have invested more than $67,000,000 in their operations and whose taxes have increased by 500 per cent since 1913, are entitled to reasonable protection so that the food producers of this country may not find themselves obliged to rely upon a foreign monopoly for their supplies of this important commodity.

Once this foreign monopoly dominates the American market by shutting down the American mines, the prices of phosphate in the United States will be raised to a far higher level than that of to-day, which is the result of free competition among freely competing fields and between freely competing producers in each field with capacity easily sufficient to supply twice the normal consumption of the United States.

We know that the Moroccan Government has got all its plans set for the invasion of this market and that headquarters have been established in New York City. We do not think it can be entirely repelled. We believe that even if an excise tax of one-tenth cent per pound should be imposed, nevertheless there would be an increased movement of phosphate from abroad into this country and that the figure of 250,000 tons is not too much to be expected and that if our request for such an excise tax is granted the Government would derive a revenue of approximately half a million dollars per annum.

MORGAN H. GRACE.

NEW YORK CITY, May 3, 1932.

Mr. FLETCHER. As bearing on the pending amendment I ask to have printed in the RECORD a communication from the Southern Pine Association relating to an import tax on lumber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter and resolution were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, U. S. A., May 11, 1932.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: We wired you last night regarding the resolution adopted at a meeting of Southern Pine Manufacturers, held in New Orleans yesterday, regarding the necessity for the inclusion in the pending revenue bill of an import tax on lumber. We are inclosing an additional copy of that resolution.

Because of the peculiar nature of our present-day foreign competition, as set forth in this resolution, and because of the extremely low domestic demand, the lumber industry is in dire need of the protection that would be afforded by the proposed import tax.

There were a large number of operators from Florida present at the meeting, and it was at their suggestion that we immediately telegraphed to you the resolution setting forth their views. We certainly hope that this measure may have your full support.

Yours very truly,

SOUTHERN PINE ASSOCIATION,
C. C. SHEPPARD.

LUMBER IMPORT TAX

Whereas the lumber industry of the United States is now operating at approximately 20 per cent of capacity, and with the many communities in the South dependent entirely upon the sawmills, thousands of families are undergoing extreme hardship and privation because of the forced curtailment of lumber production; and

Whereas Canadian trade agreements with Australia, South Africa, England, Ireland, and Scotland, preferential duties of other countries, and the general depreciation of foreign currency have practically eliminated the exportation of lumber by the United States to countries which heretofore have consumed tremendous quantities; and

Whereas, with only the domestic markets remaining, and these being on an extremely subnormal basis of consumption, the lumber manufacturers are faced with the dumpage of surplusage by Canadian producers, who are protected by higher prices in British-controlled territories, and with importations of lumber produced in Russia from confiscated timber with convict or forced labor; and

Whereas the Senate Finance Committee, recognizing the principle of protecting the natural resources of this country and the labor engaged in their conversion, has incorporated in the pending revenue bill import taxes on certain commodities, including lumber: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, manufacturers of southern pine lumber, representing all of the Southern States, in meeting assembled, urge upon our Congressmen and Senators the vital importance to their constituents and to the country at large of this tax on lumber imports; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be mailed to Congressmen and Senators of the United States from all of the States represented at this meeting, with the recommendation that party principles be brushed aside during the existing emergency, and that they give their full support to this measure, which will not only serve to provide additional Federal revenue but will relieve a basic industry of uneconomic competition and more quickly provide employment for the hundreds of thousands of men and women whose only means of livelihood is provided by the lumber industry.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. COOLIDGE. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD an article appearing in the Boston Herald under date of May 16, showing conditions in Massachusetts regarding per capita expenditures with reference to the unemployment situation in the Commonwealth. The article is entitled "Massachusetts Staggering Under Fifty-Million Dole for Year."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

MASSACHUSETTS IS STAGGERING UNDER FIFTY MILLION "DOLE" FOR YEAR—PER CAPITA EXPENDITURE OF $15 A PERSON—BOSTON EXPECTS TO SPEND $14,000,000, OR SIX TIMES THE TOTAL FOR 1928

By Edward Allen

Massachusetts this year is staggering under the burden of a $50,000,000 "dole."

This sum does not include the cost of running expensive State municipal, county, and Federal hospitals and institutions. It does not represent money paid out by the State for public welfare or cash expended by the Federal Government for veterans' compensation and pensions.

It includes merely the cost of operating welfare agencies in the cities and towns for the immediate relief of the unemployed or extraordinary suffering caused by the death or incapacity of the family provider.

It amounts to a per capita expenditure of about $15 a person. Each taxpayer has to bear many times that amount.

In Boston the "dole," public and private, is expected to exceed $14,000,000 this year.

The overseers of the public welfare alone are distributing more than $1,000,000 every month.

The $3,000,000 raised in the united Boston unemployment campaign was barely sufficient to maintain the institutions for which it was collected for 10 weeks.

Soldiers' relief, due to the discharge of veterans employed on the Kenmore Square subway extension project, is mounting rapidly. In April, 1931, the department spent $26,142. Last month it distributed $105,014.

Since then 103 veterans have been laid off, with the expectancy that the figure would reach 500 within a few days. The rest have been placed on part time.

At the present rate, soldiers' relief will cost the city more than $1,125,000 this year. The cost for the first four months of 1932 was $275,956 as compared with $170,000 in 1931.

In addition, private charities received from the privately collected unemployment fund a third of the $3,000,000 which was successfully raised. Their share does not include the income from large gifts, endowments, and other regular sources.

In March, 1932, the Family Welfare Society of Boston distributed $49,148.12 as compared with $20,333.06 a year ago. The expenditures of other private charitable organizations increased proportionately.

The Worcester "dole" is now in excess of that paid by Boston in 1928, in spite of the fact that Boston is more than four times as large as the central Massachusetts city.

The Worcester Public Welfare Department spent $444,182 in 1928. Last year it expended $1,239,038.39. So far this year it has distributed $680,026. In addition, the city raised $628,404 for its private charities in the annual community fund campaign.

Boston's overseers of the public welfare spent only $2,200,000 in 1928—a sixth of what they will expend this year, if present conditions continue.

Newton, with its admirable system of coordinating private and public charity, is able to account for every penny expended on the unemployed.

In the first four months this year, Newton distributed for various forms of charity $96,010.15, or more than the entire 1928 expenditure of $85,703.35. The 1931 figure was $204,358.

Because of the multiplicity of systems employed in the various municipalities and because of the overlapping between payment for labor and the "dole" for involuntary idleness, comparison of the cost of relief in the various cities and towns is virtually impossible.

The Newton figures include soldiers' relief, mothers' aid, old-age pensions, the mayor's welfare committee, which spent $36,000 of private funds for labor last year, and the welfare bureau, another organization dispensing private funds.

The Cambridge public welfare roll will cost more than $1,000,000 this year. In nine months last year the figure was $477,000. In 12 months of 1928 it was only $194,000.

The Brookline welfare list for the first four months of 1932 cost $75,629, more than twice the entire 1928 figure of $37,211. The 1931 expenditures were only $110,801.

BIG BELMONT GAIN

In Belmont, welfare relief cost $8,733 in 1928; $17,505.86 during the first four months this year.

Concord welfare department have shown a decrease. The expense for the first four months this year was $3,700. Last year it was $4,600. The total last year was $1,000 less than 1928, when the figure stood at $13,000.

Haverhill's expenditures for the same department during the first four months this year were $129,461—in excess of the entire 1928 figure. The 1931 total was $294,183.67.

Lexington in three months this year outstripped its entire 1928 expenditure of $7,226. Its 1931 total was $16,413.

In Lawrence, exclusive of mothers' aid, the welfare cost in April was $46,585. The expense for the first four months was $174,916, as compared with $281,268 for 12 months last year.

In Watertown, the expenditure was $53,699 in 1928, $204,564 in 1931, $111,596 so far this year.

In Waltham the city paid $124,093.22 in 1928, $314,714 last year, $86,689 so far this year.

Needham spent $15,915 in 1923, $40,686 last year, $4,716 in April.

Milton spent $1,500 from public funds and $3,200 from the Cunningham fund in April. In 1928 its entire relief costs were only $12,297.

The smaller cities and towns are keeping pace with Boston in the increase of expenditures for soldiers' relief. Wakefield spent $6,000 for this item in 1928, $19,210 in 1931, $12,356 so far this year.

Reading spent $6,599 in 1928, $10,962 last year, $3,157 in three months this year.

Fall River spent for welfare relief, mothers' aid, and soldiers' relief in 1928, $449,328; in 1931, $750,425; so far this year, $292,021.

Chelsea spent more than $410,000 for general and soldiers' aid in 1931 and has spent nearly $190,000 already in 1932.

Revere spent for welfare relief in 1931, $155,177 and, exclusive of administration expenses, has spent $73,110 this year.

Winthrop spent $28,180.40 for welfare and soldiers' relief in 1931. The figures so far this year are not available.

Natick's welfare and soldiers' aid expenses in 1928 were nearly $35,000. In 1931 they had mounted to $119,000. In addition, $9,931 has been spent in recent months from a privately collected fund.

WELLESLEY SPENDS $750 A WEEK

Wellesley's relief list in 1928 cost $12,000. Last year showed a slight increase—to $15,743. However, an additional $35,000 was spent for "made" work for the jobless in 1931 and the present expenditure is $750 a week.

Somerville spent for welfare and soldiers' relief in 1928 $220,526; last year, $509,578.54; estimated for 1932, $839,600.

Melrose spent more than $57,000 for soldiers' relief and public welfare in 1931. So far this year it has spent more than $27,000.

Medford spent $158,490 in 1931 for the same items; this year it has spent nearly $86,000 in four months.

Everett spent $490,000 in 1931 for soldiers' and public welfare; this year it spent $250,000 in four months and estimates the cost of relief alone for the year at $625,000.

POLITICAL ACTIVITIES IN POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a few days ago the Second Assistant Postmaster General attended a convention of postmasters at St. Louis, and upon that occasion he advised them in effect to engage actively in support of Mr. Hoover, to engage in political activities, and that if they did not do so he would be in Washington within a few days and would be glad to receive their resignations.

In view of the compliment paid this morning by the able Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] to the Post Office Department, I feel constrained to challenge attention to that statement and to the statement made some time anterior thereto by the Postmaster General, in which, as I recall it, he stated that postmasters might engage in political activity outside of office hours.

The New York Herald Tribune of Tuesday, May 17—and that is a good Republican newspaper—contains an editorial entitled "Cracking the Whip," in which it castigates the Second Assistant Postmaster General for his position. I ask that the editorial may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CRACKING THE WHIP

What is the first duty of a postmaster? To maintain the efficiency of the Postal Service? Not at all. According to W. Irving Glover, our Second Assistant Postmaster General, a postmaster is filling his job just as long as he is campaigning for the administration that gave him that job, and no longer. Mr. Glover invited all Missouri postmasters who won't "get out on the firing line" for President Hoover to resign. The Missouri postmasters, strangely enough, appear neither to have thrown anything nor to have invited Mr. Glover to resign himself if he could not enlarge his conception of the duties of a public servant.

There are two kinds of postal employees: Those who are classed under civil service and are therefore forbidden by statute to indulge in party politics, and those who are presidential appointees, outside of civil service, therefore vulnerable to all the lashings of stupid and intolerant partisanship.

In a postal class by himself stands Mr. Glover, who seems to be earning a salary (contributed out of our taxes) by his ability to make a noise with the whip. Won't somebody please take the whip away from him?

Mr. KING. At the same time I offer an amendment to the Post Office Department appropriation bill proposing that no part of any appropriation provided therein shall be used for the payment of salary or compensation to the present Second Assistant Postmaster General. While we may not remove him, we certainly may refuse him his salary.

The amendment was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At the proper place in the bill insert:

"That no part of any appropriation provided herein shall be used for the payment of salary or compensation to the present Second Assistant Postmaster General."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I can not conceive that the Post Office Department should be used for political purposes as it has been for some time, and evidently as it is intended by the administration that it shall be used in the future. I think we might restrain, by proper amendments to the Post Office Department appropriation bill, the execution of the plan which apparently is in the minds of those in charge of the administration. I offer an amendment with that object in view.

The amendment was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. KING to the bill (H. R. 9699) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, viz: At the end of the bill insert the following new section:

"SEC. 9. No part of any appropriation made by Title II of this act shall be used for payment of salary or compensation to any postmaster unless and until he submits a statement under oath that (1) during the period for which such salary or compensation was payable he has not used or permitted to be used any part of the post-office building as a meeting place for any political club or organization or in connection with the conduct of political activities of any sort, and (2) that during such period he has not engaged in any political activities."

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 927. An act for the relief of the estate of Franklin D. Clark; to the Committee on Finance.

H. R. 1962. An act for the relief of Noble Jay Hall; and

H. R. 2606. An act for the relief of Edward Christianson; to the Committee on Claims.

GUARANTEE OF BANK DEPOSITS

Mr. FLETCHER introduced a bill (S. 4725) providing for the guarantee of bank deposits, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the bill is a short bill but of great importance as such a bill if passed would immediately put an end to hoarding, would cause a return to the banks probably of $2,000,000,000; would end the possibilities of a run on the bank; would restore the confidence of bank officials, bank directors, bank stockholders, as well as their depositors, and would enable the bank to feel so great a sense of security that they would no longer be disposed to contract credit. They would be encouraged to make loans for productive purposes to the extent of their capacity where the security was satisfactory. Moreover, the bank depositors being likewise relieved of fear would undoubtedly take advantage of the extremely low prices of property at present to invest, and we should immediately have a rise and a justified rise in the value of real estate and all forms of property, including stocks that were sound and bonds that were good. The rise in property and commodity values would stimulate a restoration to prosperity, would increase consumption and production, and carloadings, and the national income from which revenues could be obtained for government of counties, cities, States, and of the United States. This would contribute in an important way in balancing the Budget permanently, would enable the people to pay their taxes, settle their debts, and do so without sacrifice. It would make unnecessary nuisance taxes, and enable the tax rate to be reduced on incomes and on commodities.

The bill provides a guarantee fund of $167,000,000 from the sums paid the United States as a franchise tax from the Federal reserve banks; $100,000,000 from the surplus of the reserve banks, both of which funds have been the earnings arising from the deposits of the people; and a further fund of approximately $100,000,000 per annum arising from a tax of 5 cents a quarter per $100 of average deposits for the quarter.

These funds would be of the greatest abundance, as demonstrated by the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency, which show that the losses to the depositors of the national banking system since it was founded in 1865, 67 years ago, has only been about $82,000,000 up to January 1, 1930. During the last two years, because of the stock-market collapse of 1929, the failures have been numerous, but a repetition of such a catastrophe can be prevented and, I assume, will be prevented by suitable legislation and proper safeguards.

Under this bill a number of safeguards are provided, to wit, that the deposits of no bank are guaranteed unless there is a capital and surplus of at least $25,000 as a primary guaranty; that the management of the bank and its condition shall be kept acceptable to the guarantee board.

The bill does not tax the banks and will probably cost the banks nothing. It taxes the depositor a very small sum for an insurance of his own deposit, and this insurance premium can, in all human probability, be discontinued after three or four years as unnecessary, as the earning of the guaranty fund invested in United States securities should by that time be abundant as a guarantee fund.

This bill has the advantage of affording equal safety to both National and State banks. The safety of the entire system is of great importance to the stability of business, as the checks against the deposits of the banks of the United States amount to over $700,000,000,000 annually and comprise the real "money" of the country, the "means of payment" by which payments are made and credits established. By checks probably 95 per cent of the business of the country is done, and the volume of these checks measures the volume of business transactions.

I regard the immediate payment of the depositor in case the bank fails as of great importance to the value of the plan proposed and that the payment of the insurance premium by the depositor is sound in principle and will be acceptable both to the depositor and to the banks.

The limitation of interest paid on deposits is intended to prevent unsound banking and unfair competition.

I request that the bill be printed in the RECORD for the information of Senators and of the public, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

There being no objection, the bill was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill providing for the guarantee of bank deposits, and for other purposes

S. 4725

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established a "guarantee fund" consisting of an amount contributed by the Secretary of the Treasury equal to the sums heretofore paid to the United States as a franchise tax by the Federal reserve banks and of future payments from the same source; the sum of $100,000,000 to be held by the Federal reserve banks from their surplus in proportion to their assets, subject to call of the guarantee board and the insurance premiums to be collected of the depositors as provided in section 3 of this act. Such fund shall be administered by the guarantee board and shall be invested in United States bonds. From this fund the deposits insured by this act shall, in the event of insolvency, be paid immediately that such deposits are definitely ascertained.

The guarantee board shall consist of four members, with the Comptroller of the Currency ex officio as a fifth member. The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, such members for a term of two, four, six, and eight years, respectively; the successor of a member of the said board, upon the termination of his term, shall be appointed for a term of eight years. Not more than two members shall be of the same political party. The President shall designate a governor of the guarantee board. Each member shall be paid from the guarantee fund a salary of $10,000 per annum, payable monthly, and his actual traveling expenses when on official business.

SEC. 2. The deposits of all national banks and of all member banks of the Federal reserve system shall be insured by the guarantee fund under the conditions of this act. The deposits of all State banks, trust companies, and mutual savings banks applying therefor and contracting with the guarantee board in the manner and form required by the said board shall likewise be insured by the guarantee fund. The deposits of no bank shall be insured under this act whose capital, surplus, and undivided profits are less than $25,000, or unless the condition and management of such bank is established and maintained to the satisfaction of the guarantee board and up to the standards of security established by the national banking system.

SEC. 3. The banks whose deposits are guaranteed under this act are hereby required on and after July 1, 1933, to collect from each depositor an insurance premium quarterly of 5 cents per $100 or less of average deposits for the preceding quarter and in multiples of $100 at the same rate. On or berore the 10th day of the month following the banks whose deposits are insured shall remit the insurance premiums as instructed by the guarantee board under penalty of forfeiting the insurance. When the net funds so collected shall total the sum of $300,000,000 the guarantee board may reduce the premium. The double liability of stockholders of national banks is hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. When deposits are ascertained and paid the receipt of the depositor shall contain an assignment of his claim against the bank and comprise a lien on its assets in favor of the guarantee board. No bank whose deposits are guaranteed under the terms of this act shall after this act becomes effective hypothecate its assets for any special deposit, and no official of the United States shall demand the assets of a bank as security for a deposit, but all such deposits of the United States shall pay for its insurance as other depositors.

The guarantee board shall have authority to negotiate with the officials of any State to make effective the contracts with State banks, trust companies, and mutual savings banks in accordance with the laws of such State. No bank whose deposits are insured, except savings banks, shall pay interest exceeding 3½ per cent per annum for time deposits or exceeding 1 per cent per annum for demand deposits.

The insurance of bank deposits under this act shall go into effect on and after July 1, 1933.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 1 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), under the order previously entered, took a recess until Monday, May 23, 1932, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, MAY 21, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. John Compton Ball, of the Metropolitan Baptist Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

We come to Thee, our Heavenly Father, with a word of praise upon our lips for Thy watchcare over us through the night; that Thou hast permitted us to enter into the light and the activities of a new day, and to pray that Thy blessings may rest upon all that we think or say or do. We read in Thy word that all those in civil authority are ministers of Thine. May we wait upon our ministry this day and may the words of our mouths and the meditations of our hearts be acceptable to Thy sight, O Lord, our Savior and our Redeemer. We pray that Thou wilt hasten that day when the great blanket of depression shall be lifted from the earth and driven away as the rising sun drives away the mist of the valley, and that we may hear the hum of activity in city and in hamlet, and there may be no hungry child, no worn-out mother, no hands of men unemployed. To this end, bless the deliberations of this House, for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ECONOMY

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of economy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, several days ago I completed, after three months of intensive survey and study, a comprehensive program of governmental policy in retrenchment and revenue raising and introduced in Congress bills to carry it out. It is not presented merely as a temporary expedient but as a guide to permanent future policy, with substantial immediate benefits.

This program, if adopted, will do much to relieve the present emergency and prevent its repetition in the future so far as a balanced Budget is concerned.

The program consists of four major changes in governmental policy, and a fifth as an immediate expedient. Merely temporary expedients, engineered under high pressure and adopted under the lash of a shrewdly organized propaganda whip that threatens political punishment, will not afford genuine nor lasting relief. Those interests, who first obtained from Congress their dole, amounting to a billion dollars by way of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and other aids to banks and the larger corporations, and who are now seeking to avoid their proper share of the burden of these appropriations and who seek to avoid their just share of taxation by transferring the burden to the masses and those of moderate means by way of wage and salary reductions and a sales tax are doing more to endanger the country than they themselves realize. In order to high pressure their selfish demands they are deliberately indulging in a campaign of deceptive propaganda to further terrorize the public to force their wishes upon Congress. The grave danger is that they may turn this depression into a real panic and their selfish efforts to escape their just burdens will become a boomerang that will return to destroy them.

Nothing was said about the absolute necessity of immediately balancing the Budget and drastically reducing Federal expenses by serious wage cuts while they themselves were at the doors of Congress earlier in the year seeking relief for themselves aggregating more than two and one-half billion dollars.

It was not until they safely got theirs that they launched into this frenzied campaign to deny relief to everyone else, and to cut the wages and thereby lower the American standard of living, the maintenance of which is the basis and only hope for economic recovery.

We must plan for long-time operations and this program provides for that, although relief will start from the beginning and grow as the program expands.

The first step to accomplish lasting and effecting economy is a resolution providing for a joint House and Senate committee to make a comprehensive and exhaustive study of all Federal governmental activities and agencies.

These are to be classified in three divisions:

First. Those functions and expenditures absolutely essential for the main purpose of government, namely, to maintain peace, provide common defense, insure domestic tranquillity, establish justice, and protect the rights of the citizens.

Second. Those functions and expenditures that provide for these purposes in the second degree or that are collateral to it, principally to promote the general welfare of the people, guide and regulate business, cooperate in vital matters with the States, but functions which are not absolutely necessary to maintain a Federal Union.

Third. All of those functions and their expenditures which are not directly related to the main purpose of government but are aids to and participation in the private business of citizens, States, counties, and municipalities, such as all Federal-aid welfare work, ship and air mail subsidies, farm boards, and many activities that are really luxurious services performed gratuitously by the Federal Government but that are in reality the responsibility of the individual, local community, organized group, or various industries themselves and are not properly related to the strict business of government as such.

When such a survey is completed and a report presented to Congress the public can then decide on a future policy and revamp the whole governmental machinery to any degree that meets their desire and purse.

The people will have to decide just how far they want the Government to go in its service to the public and how much they are willing to spend for these services that extend beyond the pure function of a government to maintain the Union. They will be able to receive only so much as they are willing to pay for. It is for the people to review the whole situation and decide where they want to strike the balance. Only in such a manner can a definite policy be established that will be well balanced, related, and coordinated.

The second step provides legislation that will permit the President to set up a flexible pool of Government employees that will be elastic enough to serve practically all purposes for which new bureaus and commissions are constantly being created.

This pool will have a permanent skeleton staff, and for the rest will temporarily borrow employees and officials from any Government department. Frequently one Government department has a slack period in its work, while another is at its peak load. The usual practice is to at all times carry the maximum number of employees that will be needed at peak load. This bill will permit temporary interchange of personnel by assignment from one department to another as well as to the pool. The pool itself could take over immediately the functions of many existing bureaus and commissions, thereby also eliminating much needless duplication and extravagance. Much of the work of these bureaus and commissions is, in reality, temporary and seasonal, yet complete and elaborate organizations are maintained permanently.

It would save at the most expensive place, particularly the higher-paid management and direction of these various agencies, by consolidating under one trained, nonpolitical, and nonpatronage head the administration of these more or less routine functions.

Of particular benefit there will be the avoiding in the future of the setting up of new bureaus and commissions every time some additional function is to be performed. Once established by law these bureaus have a way of fastening themselves on the body politic, acquiring political influence and perpetuating themselves from then on. This flexible-pool plan will permit temporary acts to be administered while the need lasts and then ceasing when the actual purpose is served.

These bureaus, now once established, reach out for ever-increasing power, usurp rights of the people, and become seekers after growing appropriations ever after. It is this condition that is largely responsible for the present spread of the intolerable bureaucracy that has grown up in this country.

This can be eliminated by this plan.

The third provision is a constitutional amendment to permit taxing securities that are at present tax exempt. The main difficulty to-day in reaching the large fortunes to get them to bear their fair share of the tax burden is their investment on a large-scale basis in tax-exempt securities. This amendment, if adopted, will make the income tax actually effective, which it is not now in the higher brackets. It will prevent the inordinate accumulation of superfortunes in nonproductive isolation but will keep money in productive circulation.

The fourth step is to adopt a policy of accumulating Federal surpluses in times of prosperity for use in times of stress. When the country is faced with threatened decline in general business the Government should do two things. It should lower taxes and increase expenditures.

It can do so only if there is a long-time planning policy of public work and the accumulation of surpluses in the Treasury. It is in such times as the present that the Government should do most of its public building and lend its aid to States in the matter of road building and education.

It has been the greed of the large interests that has made this impossible in the past. As soon as a surplus became apparent, demands were made that the tax rate, especially in the higher brackets, be reduced and the surplus immediately converted into tax rebates. These rebates seldom, if ever, went to the benefit of the employees of concerns receiving them nor to the general public who paid them.

I propose that a policy be adopted of setting aside a percentage of the governmental revenues to be invested in the Government's own securities as a revolving fund, to be built up in normal and prosperous times, to be used to ease the tax burdens in stringent times and do such public work then as will absorb unemployment at such times. This will have the effect of narrowing the margin between the high and low times we now experience and will tend to stabilize business and diminish the extremes of the present cycles.

The fifth and immediate plan for relief is to abolish the prohibition forces of the Federal Government at once, turning the enforcement over to the States under the joint provision of the eighteenth amendment, and thereby save $50,000,000 a year. No useful purpose is served by the attempted prohibition enforcement and it entails a heavy tax burden upon the people. Collateral with this is a provision to legalize and tax wine and beer under the eighteenth amendment until it can be repealed and thereby produce a revenue, which is most sorely needed, of at least $600,000,000.

This whole program taken in conjunction with measures already passed by Congress, or in the legislative process, will halt the downward trend and soon effect a healthy and permanent stabilization. The real object of all our efforts is to revive business and restore the sources of revenue. Having voted over a billion dollars to banking and industry to save and stabilize them, we can not now encourage nor foster a program of shifting the burden to the little men in the masses and at the same time restrict or destroy his purchasing power. If we do, we will be forced into the position of giving him his dole, too, as we have to organized business. It is to avoid reducing this country to the state where a general dole will be necessary that I present the above program, in the hope of maintaining the American standard, preserving the individual home, reviving business by increasing the purchasing power of the masses, and prevent thereby a complete collapse and consequent disastrous radicalism.

The whole system of private capital and individual property rights is at stake. It will take courage, self-sacrifice, loyalty, and united patriotic devotion to preverve our present benefits. We are now facing that test. Hysteria and panic-stricken propaganda will not aid in the solution. We need cool heads, calm judgment, and the benefit of every experience and lesson of the past. Hysterical backbiting and senseless, frenzied political attacks will only tend to further destroy the people's confidence and further complicate and delay the solution. It will take patience, courage, and vision. New and daring departures will have to be resorted to. The great bankers and industrial leaders led us into the present situation, and with all of their copybook formulas they have not been able to get us out of it in the three years that they have had their chance. Now, we must try new and different methods.

H. R. 4668—FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill amending the flood control act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks on H. R. 4668, which is an amendment to the flood control act of May 15, 1928, to require the Government to pay the costs of setback levees along the Mississippi River, I desire to correct the erroneous statements made and the misapprehension of many Members of the House with respect to the meaning and effect of the amendment.

The matter came up yesterday, Friday, May 20, on the resolution reported by the Rules Committee to provide for the consideration of this amendment. The time for debate was under the control of the Rules Committee and limited to 30 minutes on each side. The members of the Flood Control Committee intended, of course, to discuss the merits of the bill upon the passage of the resolution. The House, by a vote of 186 to 136, defeated the resolution of the Rules Committee providing for the consideration of the bill. There was thus no opportunity for the members of the Flood Control Committee to discuss the merits of the act, except the three minutes allowed the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REID].

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] stated that the Assistant Chief of Engineers had informed him that it was difficult to estimate the costs of the bill. The gentleman indicated that it would cost an enormous sum. He was anxious to know the number of acres that would be thrown out that the Government would be compelled to purchase if the act passed. I asked him to yield and offered to supply the information. By leading the fight for the defeat of the resolution for consideration, the gentleman prevented the Flood Control Committee from supplying the House with the facts.

As I shall hereafter show, at the time of the passage of the flood control act of May, 1928, Gen. Edgar Jadwin, then Chief of Engineers, estimated that the costs of the rights of way for levees to the local levee boards would be approximately $4,000,000.

In the execution of the project, now from 50 to 75 per cent complete, the actual facts and accurate estimates show that the costs will be approximately $8,000,000. In no event, therefore, would the costs to the Government exceed $4,000,000. The main-line levees are located along the States of Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee, but for the most part, along the States of Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana. I speak accurately and by the record. The Flood Control Committee was prepared to give the House data with respect to acreage and costs. They were denied this privilege by the defeat of the resolution for consideration.

Approximately 300 miles of main-line levee are located along the district in Mississippi that I represent. General Jadwin estimated the the rights of way for these levees would be approximately $1,168,420. This is not guesswork. I am giving his exact language from the hearings. As disclosed by pages 143 to 148, inclusive, of the hearings in January, 1932, on the pending bill, the costs of rights of way are practically double the estimate of General Jadwin. The work is about 60 per cent complete. As shown by page 147 of the hearings, about 8,700 acres of land, including 359 lots in the city of Greenville, were acquired from May 15, 1928, up to February 1, 1932, including the fiscal year 1931, at an average cost of $102 per acre. I am familiar with the area, and I estimate that approximately 3,000 acres of the average value of $50 per acre were thrown out. Again, on said page 147, for the fiscal years 1932 and 1933, the estimates are that 11,017 acres would be thrown out and that this amount has actually cost $269,080. There will probably be 2,000 acres additional in this district before the entire project is completed, at an estimated cost of from $25 to $50 an acre.

The figures that I have given are the acreage of the Mississippi levee district, with a levee line of approximately 210 miles. The upper or Yazoo Delta levee district has a levee line of approximately 90 miles, and as shown by page 145 of the hearings on the pending bill the loops or setbacks have cost approximately $399,600, and my estimate is that some 3,000 acres will be thrown out in said district. There is no guesswork about the matter. There will be no large costs to the Government. If the bill passes, in Mississippi the Government would not be required to purchase flowage rights over more than from 18,000 to 19,000 acres, and the costs, including improvements, would be approximately $800,000 to $1,000,000.

The rights of way, including the setbacks, are costing in Mississippi twice the amount that General Jadwin said they would cost. The same ratio obtains in Arkansas and Louisiana.

The additional costs are largely because of setbacks, especially under the administration of General Jadwin, Chief of Engineers. The flood control act provided for revetment for caving banks. Eighty millions dollars was allocated for this purpose. The Government engineers are building setbacks more cheaply than they can construct revetment. The cost to the Government is less, but the cost to local interests is more.

The purpose of the act is to prevent as much as possible the setbacks by requiring the Government to assume only the costs of flowage rights between the new levee lines and the river. It has developed that if setbacks are constructed instead of revetting the banks, and if the Government pays for flowage rights resulting from setbacks, the ultimate costs to the Government would be much less than if the banks were revetted as required by the adopted project.

If the engineers had followed the adopted project, if levees had been located as indicated by the Government engineers instead of setbacks to provide a life for the levees of 30 years, whereas the adopted project contemplated 20 years, if setbacks had not been made, and if revetments had been constructed, the Flood Control Committee would not have reported the pending bill. Setbacks have been largely used, although the general setback plan was rejected by General Jadwin because it was too expensive.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] opposed consideration of the bill, and he asserted that the levee boards had repudiated their undertaking to furnish rights of way. The gentleman has not carefully considered the amendment. He gives attention to so many matters that frequently he does not examine bills as carefully as he otherwise would. The pending bill clarifies section 3 of the flood control act of 1928 and includes, word for word, the first paragraph of section 3. It reaffirms that the States and local levee boards are to provide all rights of way for levee foundations. There is no disposition on the part of the people in the lower Mississippi Valley to ask for relief from any of the provisions that Congress placed upon levee boards at the time it adopted the flood control act of 1928. The whole purpose of the amendment is to clarify.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] repeated the arguments that he made four years ago as to the enormous costs of the project, which were then refuted by the House. His statement is completely refuted by the statement of Maj. Gen. Lytle Brown, Chief of Engineers, that while less than half the $325,000,000 authorized has been expended the work is 60 per cent complete. It is passing strange that Mr. FREAR and men like him would make wild and extravagant statements when it is so easy to ascertain the real facts. He can not reconcile his statement that the adopted project would cost $1,000,000,000 or $1,500,000,000, when the House passed the flood control act of 1928 by a vote of 254 to 91 over his opposition, and when the Chief of Engineers stated or disclosed by the hearings that less than one-half of the authorization has been expended and the project is more than one-half complete.

The pending bill makes no substantial change in the flood control act of May 15, 1928. The States and local interests will still be required to pay every dollar, and vastly more than it was intended they should pay. The costs of rights of way will amount to more than the estimates of General Jadwin. The local interests will pay more than $4,000,000, but under the laws of Louisiana and Arkansas, as disclosed by the hearings, there is no provision for compensation either by the Federal Government or the States to the landowners for lands that are thrown out by reason of the unusual setbacks made in the execution of the project.

I am astounded at the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] who says, and who argues, that landowners whose property is taken by levee construction and thrown out by setbacks have their recourse either in the Court of Claims or by filing suits against the Government. He is usually careful. I am surprised at such a hasty statement on his part. He spoke without being advised and without investigation. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided in a number of cases that damages resulting from the construction of levees on the Mississippi River for the public good are not a taking of property, but are merely incidental to the exercise of a servitude, to which it is always subject. (Gibson v. U. S., 166 U. S. 271; Bedford v. U. S., 192 U. S. 233; Jackson v. U. S., 230 U. S. 1; Hughes v. U. S., 230 U. S. 24.) The gentleman also states that the property owners should pay local assessments. They are now furnishing rights of way. The costs of these rights of way in the execution of the project annually since the flood of 1927 have been burdensome. The gentleman overlooks the fact that the property owners of the lower Mississippi Valley have expended $292,000,000 in constructing levees prior to the great flood of 1927. He overlooks the fact that the two levee boards in Mississippi had expended in the past 45 years approximately $45,000,000 in building the levees to the 1914 grade and section under the direction of the Mississippi River Commission.

The citizens were under the impression that the Mississippi River Commission, the agency of the Government, was right and that they would be protected. Bonds were issued to enable the levee districts to contribute to the construction of practically the entire levee line in Mississippi up to the 1914 grade and section. Instead of merely paying assessments, State and local levee boards have paid much more than the Government has expended or will expend under the adopted project for levees.

It is to be regretted that the merits of the bill were not considered and that no opportunity was afforded for an analysis of the act. Its provisions are reasonable. The costs have been substantially determined. There is no speculation. The levee boards have borrowed the money, and the lands have been acquired. I have given the acreage and the costs from the actual hearings. If the levee boards are reimbursed, as provided by the act, the reimbursement will be for only the flowage rights between the new levee lines and the river. The local interests will be required to bear the costs of rights of way for the levee foundations. I repeat that a reasonable estimate of the cost to the Government would not exceed $4,000,000. Some 18,000 to 19,000 acres of land in Mississippi, much less in Arkansas, and about 35,000 or 40,000 acres in Louisiana are involved. The principal levee lines are located along these States.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] referred to the fact that the Chief of Engineers had not approved the pending bill. As I shall hereafter show, he virtually admitted that an injustice had been done to property owners. It was his opinion that the Government ought not to bear the entire costs of the setbacks, but a fair conclusion from his statement is that the Government should bear a part of the costs of setbacks. Members of the Flood Control Committee considered his report and his testimony and also the report of the Acting Secretary of War. The question of payment is an economic proposition. The members of the committee felt that their conclusions with respect to economic questions were entitled to as much weight as the conclusions of either the Acting Secretary of War or the Chief of Engineers. It is fair to say that under the administration of Gen. Lytle Brown, Chief of Engineers, a more liberal policy toward landowners has obtained.

In a word, the bill provides that the Government assume the costs of setbacks. The bill further provides that the State or levee districts may acquire flowage rights to relieve the Government of condemnation suits. The matter is optional with the Government. The Secretary of War has the right to condemn in the first instance. This provision was inserted in the bill for the benefit of the Government. There are no other changes or amendments in the existing law. I repeat, to emphasize, that, if the bill passes, the local interests will be relieved of no obligation, either to furnish rights of way, maintain the levees, or otherwise under the flood control act.

I now refer to the essential provisions of the flood control act of May 15, 1928. I will set forth the purpose of the pending bill after making an analysis of its provisions. I will make reference to the hearings as to the costs of the amendment.

The United States should provide flowage rights by reason of setbacks in the levee lines on the Mississippi River, inasmuch as they were not contemplated in the adopted project.

H. R. 4668 is an amendment to the flood control act of May 15, 1928, to require the United States to compensate property owners for flowage rights over all lands situated between the levee lines of the adopted project by reason of setbacks on the Mississippi River. Its purpose is to clarify and effectuate the intent of Congress with respect to local contributions. It requires no authorization and involves no additional appropriation.

Under the flood control act of May 15, 1928, Congress authorized the appropriation of $325,000,000 for the flood control of the lower Mississippi River. Section 2 of the act declared that there had been a full compliance with the principle of local contribution. Under section 3 the States or local levee boards are required to provide all rights of way for levee foundations on the Mississippi River between Cape Girardeau, Mo., and the Head of Passes.

The flood control act adopted the so-called Jadwin project for the control of floods of the lower Mississippi Valley. There were extensive hearings during 1927 and 1928. Every phase of the subject was studied and investigated. The Chief of Engineers furnished the Flood Control Committee of Congress with his estimates of the costs of rights of way along the main river under the adopted project, and they are found on page 4830, parts 6 and 7, of the hearings, 1927–28. The estimates amounted to $4,088,790. When the bill was passed, the States or levee districts understood that they would be called upon to pay this amount for rights of way for levees.

The adopted project provided for enlarging, raising, and strengthening the levees along the main river and for revetment of caving banks. Eighty million dollars of the authorization of $325,000,000 was to be used for revetment and in aid of navigation. Caving banks occur in the bends of the river.

In the execution of the project it has been found to be more economical to construct levees across points in the bends than to revet the caving banks. In many cases the lands in the bends are highly improved and very valuable. No compensation was provided for flowage rights over these lands in the adopted project. It was anticipated that they would be protected. The result is and has been that the local interests have been required to pay a great deal more for rights of way than was anticipated, and in many cases property owners have been paid nothing for lands taken.

It was necessary to improve the levees on the south bank of the Arkansas and on the south bank of the Red Rivers. Under the adopted project the Government is to furnish the rights of way for levees along these two tributaries, with the result that no unusual setbacks have occurred and but small areas of lands have been left unprotected. Where the Government is required to furnish rights of way, lands have been protected, whereas, on the main river, where the local interests are required to furnish rights of way, valuable lands have been left between the new main levees and the river and are thus unprotected.

ANALYSIS

The purpose of the pending bill is to remove the injustice to landowners under the adopted project. The Committee on Flood Control reported substantially the same bill on February 16, 1931, when the Republicans were in control of the House. The difference between that bill, which was H. R. 17074, Seventy-first Congress, third session, and the pending act is that the amendment under consideration includes compensation for damages to improvements on the lands between the new levees and the river. The language clarifies rather than changes the meaning of H. R. 17074. The Flood Control Committee has conducted numerous hearings on the subject of setbacks and relocations.

The act reported by Mr. KOPP, of Iowa, on February 16, 1931, was the bill upon which the Flood Control Committee agreed after Mr. WILSON, of Louisiana, had introduced H. R. 11548, which also required the Government to furnish rights of way. A report was submitted by the Acting Secretary of War on H. R. 11548, and the material part of the report is found in the hearings of 1930, part 5, page 1290. I quote from the report of the Acting Secretary of War as follows:

> There is more of a question in this proposed amendment than the mere rights of way of levees. In the setback of a levee the question of abandoning considerable amounts of the best land in the valley will arise. The question is, Who shall pay for the land abandoned, if it should be paid for at all? At present the burden falls on those whose business it is to procure the rights of way, namely, the local people, and they should, in my opinion, be required to bear at least a part of such burden. The proposed amendment does not cover this feature as it should.

The bill on which the report was made required the United States to pay not only for flowage rights but for rights of way. The substance of the report of the War Department, as well as the substance of the testimony of Maj. Gen. Lytle Brown, Chief of Engineers, is that the local interests should be required to bear at least a part of the burden. The Flood Control Committee thereupon amended the bill on which the report of the Acting Secretary of War was submitted and unanimously reported H. R. 17074 on February 13, 1931, and again on February 15, 1932, unanimously reported the bill under consideration, H. R. 4668.

The amendment provides that the United States shall pay for flowage rights. It also provides that the States or levee districts may acquire the flowage rights for the United States and that the United States shall reimburse them upon proof that the flowage rights have been obtained at a fair valuation and at reasonable expense. The United States is thus relieved, unless there is an imperative necessity of resorting to direct condemnation suits to acquire flowage rights. This practice obtained in securing the rights of way on the south bank of the Arkansas and on the south band of the Red River. All the hearings disclosed that the Chief of Engineers was entirely satisfied with the values on these tributaries and there was cooperation between the local interests and the Government.

PURPOSE

As I have stated, and as I could better show by maps, in the execution of the adopted project and particularly during the tenure of General Jadwin as Chief of Engineers, it was found more economical for the Government to build levees across points than to revet the caving banks. The local interests were thus required to pay much more than was ever contemplated under the adopted project. The result has been burdensome and in some cases the local interests have been unable to provide rights of way. Citizens have not been compensated for large areas of land between the setbacks and the river. A very great injustice has been done. Levees are cheaper than revetment. It will not be necessary, even if levees are constructed, where revetments might be built, to increase the authorization or appropriation, inasmuch as levees are more economical than revetment. Justice, however, will be done to citizens and to landowners.

NINETEEN FOURTEEN GRADE

Along the States of Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana there are approximately 1,000 miles of main-line levees. These levees prior to the great flood of 1927 had been substantially built to the 1914 grade and section under the supervision of the Mississippi River Commission. The people of the lower Mississippi Valley had either built the levees or contributed approximately two-thirds of the cost of construction upon the assurance of the Mississippi commission, the agency of the Federal Government, that protection would follow.

I represent the Delta district of the State of Mississippi. There are approximately 300 miles of main-line levees between Memphis and Vicksburg. Prior to the flood of 1927 the levee lines had been completed, with the exception of about 12 miles between Brunswick and Vicksburg. As shown by page 4613 of the hearings of 1927 and 1928, the Mississippi River Commission estimated that it would cost the Mississippi Levee District approximately $330,000 to complete the Brunswick Levee and to bring the entire levee line up to the 1914 grade and section. I may say that there are two levee districts in Mississippi, the Yazoo Delta District, with about 90 miles of levee, and the Mississippi Levee District, with about 210 miles of levee. The entire levee line in the Yazoo district was above the 1914 grade and section. These two levee districts had expended in the construction of their levee lines and in local contributions for construction by the engineers of the Federal Government prior to the flood of 1927 approximately $42,000,000. There were outstanding bonds for levee construction. It is necessary to repair and maintain the levees as well as to furnish rights of way, and large annual taxes are required for these purposes under the flood control act.

Under the adopted project, as shown by the testimony of General Jadwin, Chief of Engineers, it was estimated that the costs of rights of way in the said two Mississippi levee districts, as shown by page 4830 of the hearings, aggregated $1,168,420. As shown by page 4805, the rights of way for the Yazoo Delta or upper Missippi district were estimated by General Jadwin at $68,796.

As shown by page 4803, the outstanding bonds of the Yazoo Delta District amounted to $4,444,000, while, as shown by page 4802, the outstanding bonds of the Board of Mississippi Levee Commissioners amounted to $3,126,000 at the time of the adopted project. These bonds will mature in annual installments during the next 20 years. Taxes to retire the bonds and to provide for maintenance and rights of way are levied and collected annually on all property, real and personal, in the two levee districts.

MISSISSIPPI LEVEE BOARD

The taxpayers in the Mississippi Levee District assumed, as they had the right to do, and as shown by page 4830 of the hearings on the testimony of the Chief of Engineers, that they would be called upon to pay $1,099,624 for rights of way, which is the difference between the total costs of rights of way for the State of Mississippi, $1,168,420, and the costs of rights of way for the Yazoo Delta, $68,796.

As disclosed by the hearings, part 4, Seventy-first Congress, page 1218, and as disclosed by the hearings on the pending bill, Seventy-second Congress, first session, page 147, the Mississippi Levee District, for rights of way from May 15, 1928, to February 1, 1932, actually paid $887,282, and the estimated cost of rights of way for 1932 and 1933 projects is an additional amount of $436,775, aggregating $1,324,057.

The work will probably be 75 per cent complete and approximately $500,000 for rights of way will be required to complete the main line levees in this district. The difference between the amounts actually expended by the Mississippi Levee Board and the amount of General Jadwin's estimate grows out of the fact that as disclosed by the hearings of 1930, page 1218, approximately $861,730.23 had been expended on account of setbacks. The rights of way are thus costing twice as much as estimated by General Jadwin in this district.

YAZOO DELTA LEVEE DISTRICT

As shown by the 1932 hearings, page 145, the Yazoo Delta Levee District had expended for rights of way up to February 11, 1932, approximately $846,118. The levee line in this district is approximately 60 per cent complete. Additional large amounts will be paid for rights of way.

As shown by page 4805 of the hearings, 1927–28, General Jadwin estimated that the total costs of rights of way in this district were $68,796. This levee board has already spent more than twelve times as much as General Jadwin testified they would be called upon to spend for rights of way. If revetments had been constructed and there had been no setbacks or loops, the costs to the local district would have been approximately one-half. The Government should keep faith with the people. I can offer no better illustration and no better evidence in support of the necessity for the pending legislation than the facts I have given from the record in the execution of the project in the Yazoo Delta Levee District.

COSTS

The question naturally arises as to what the passage of the pending bill will cost the Government. In practice it will provide for the transfer of funds that would otherwise be used in revetment to levees. I have given facts and figures. In the upper Mississippi district the costs under the bill would be approximately $400,000, while the costs in the lower or Mississippi River district would be approximately $600,000. As I have stated, there are about 300 miles of levee in Mississippi.

The costs of rights of way in Arkansas and Louisiana, according to the hearings before the committee, largely as a result of setbacks and loops, are from two to three times as much as the amount submitted by General Jadwin. General Jadwin estimated, as I have pointed out, the costs of rights of way in the lower Mississippi Valley to be approximately $4,000,000. In practice and as the result of economy, at the expense of citizens and taxpayers, in the construction of setbacks and loops, rather than in building revetment as provided by the project and as disclosed in the hearings, the costs will be approximately $8,000,000. The costs, therefore, under the pending bill for flowage rights, which the Government will be required to pay, will in no event exceed $4,000,000.

The passage of the amendment will in no wise interfere with the requirement of the flood control act of 1928 that the local interests furnish rights of way. In fact, section 3 of the flood control act of May 15, 1928, is embodied in the pending amendment.

The necessity for the immediate passage of the pending act is that under existing conditions the levee districts are unable to bear the burden. In some cases these districts are unable to provide rights of way, and the districts that are able to protect are the sufferers. The proposed amendment will provide for the integrity of the levee system and for the protection of the lower Mississippi Valley.

The amendment is really a clarification of the existing law. Its provisions have worked well on the south bank of the Arkansas and the south bank of the Red Rivers. No additional appropriation will be required. No further authorization is provided. Local taxpayers will not be relieved from any of the provisions of the flood control act of 1928, as disclosed by the hearings and according to the intent of Congress. The pending amendment should be adopted. The levee districts, after the adoption of the pending amendment, will certainly be required to pay for rights of way, as provided by the flood control act of 1928, more than General Jadwin estimated, as disclosed by the hearings, and more than the local interests anticipated they would be required to pay.

The respective contributions of the United States and the local interests to levee construction along the lower Yazoo Valley are economic questions. The Chief of Engineers furnishes Congress with the facts. It is for Congress to pass upon the economic questions involved. The flood control act of 1928 settled the matter as to local contributions required. I urge the passage of the bill to effectuate the intent of Congress as to local contributions and as a matter of justice. Good faith requires the passage of the bill.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I have a request from my colleague, Mr. ABERNETHY, coming through his secretary, asking unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, during my 10 years as a Representative in Congress I have tried to represent the third North Carolina congressional district as well as the State and Nation as a whole. Every moment of that service has been a genuine pleasure to me and my constituents have honored me by returning me to Congress each term with an increased majority. There is no way that I can express the gratitude in my heart to the people of my district for this confidence and trust. There is no way that I can hope to repay them except by striving even harder in their behalf.

I now am faced with opposition at a time when I am recuperating from a long and serious attack of influenza. There were two years of my present term when opposition might have come to me from any source, but no one chose to oppose me until it was thought that I was so ill that I would be unable to return to my district and answer the many unjust and unfair attacks that have been made upon me. I wish to warn my friends now that there will be false and scurrilous last-minute attacks made upon me, which has been the habit of my opposition each and every time I have been opposed for renomination. It was no doubt the hope of this opposition that I might not have the time to answer any of these attacks.

I am running for renomination purely and solely on my record of 10 years of service in Congress. This, I feel, entitles me to the confidence and support of the people of my district.

The opposition which comes to me is not based on any merit that the opposition may claim, but is predicated solely on an underhand effort to discredit and abuse me. This has been the method employed against me each and every time I have had opposition in the past. Every supposed issue that is being raised against me in this campaign has been raised heretofore and completely answered as evidenced by the large majorities I have received.

One issue raised against me in the 1930 primary was broadcast throughout the district, and yet I received the largest majority ever received by a Representative in Congress from this State. The same issue is being raised against me again which I answered two years ago.

I have fully explained heretofore the situation about the clerk hire in my office. No portion of any clerk hire comes to me or to anyone connected with me, directly or indirectly. Every cent apportioned by the Government to the clerk hire in my office is distributed to the clerks and workers in my office.

I answered the issue in reference to my opposition on reduction of Federal salaries in my speech on the floor of the House of Representatives on April 6, 1932.

I stand now and have always stood for the strictest economy in government. I have favored at all times the abolition of the many useless commissions and bureaus with which the Republican administration has burdened our country.

The House of Representatives has recently voted to decrease the Federal salaries in the higher brackets 11 per cent under the provisions of the bill approved by the Economy Committee of the House of Representatives. This I did not oppose.

There has never been any hesitancy on my part to accept any personal sacrifice for the welfare and interest of the people of my district.

The main reason I have opposition now is because I have dared to stand in the Halls of Congress and champion human rights above dollar rights.

It is a sad situation and one which will never lift us out of this depression, when we consider that more than 80 per cent of the wealth of this Nation is controlled by less than 20 per cent of the people. I stand committed to a program of legislation that will redistribute this wealth among the people of this Nation who have helped to earn and produce it. Our country can not survive and prosper under a system where a small group of wealthy interests can control the circulation of our currency. One of the causes of our many bank failures is due to this condition. The Government has the right and the power to control the value of money and to regulate the circulation of money and if, as in England and Canada, the Government controlled the value and circulation of money, the number of our bank failures would have been decreased.

I have consistently voted during my 10 years in Congress for every bill introduced for the benefit of our soldiers and veterans who served our country during the Great War. This group of individuals represents largely the downtrodden and suffering masses of our Nation. The wealthy and influential classes of our citizens represent a small percentage of this group. The men who went to war and stood in the trenches and faced gunfire gained little from the war. The big interests that waxed rich at the expense of our soldier boys on the front should be made to bear the brunt of the burden of appropriations passed by Congress for the benefit of the veterans.

My district is now suffering in this great depression. Many of my constituents are in need of the bare necessities of life; suffering and hunger are abroad in the land. The Democratic House of Representatives has tried in vain to remedy this situation, but the administration of our Government, though professing great concern for the welfare of the people, has lent its power and influence in shielding the wealthy interests from a just tax and a just proportionate burden of the upkeep of our Government.

There has been the digging, deepening, and improving of 38 waterway projects in my district and eastern North Carolina during my tenure of office, about which the people of my district know.

I have worked for and voted for every farm-relief measure offered which had for its purpose the benefit of the farmer. The farmer's problems are many and varied. It has always been my aim and purpose in the past to help work them out. I have earnestly striven to do so. I shall continue to work to this end.

I feel that I have been of benefit to the many truck growers and shippers in my district in aiding them in working out better railroad schedules and in their fight for express refrigeration service. I have worked with the Interstate Commerce Commission and with others in bringing about better conditions. Those who have received the benefits know what has been done.

The establishment of Moores Creek National Military Park at Currie, N. C.; the securing of the Fort Macon Military Reservation to the State without cost; the passage of the bill for the erection of the monument to Vice President William Rufus King at Clinton, N. C., his birthplace; these and many other activities, too numerous to mention, have, I hope, proven beneficial to my district. The establishment of many rural mail services and extensions secured by my efforts have, I hope, improved the postal service in my district.

The addition to the Federal building at Goldsboro, the securing of new Federal buildings at Mount Olive and New Bern, and improved quarters for post offices in the various towns of my district have engaged my most serious attention and efforts.

In my speech delivered in the House of Representatives on April 29, 1930, I introduced a complete index showing my work in Congress to that date. I do not have the space to set these items out in detail here, but I will be glad to furnish a copy to any of my constituents upon request. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, however, does not show the many personal calls made upon me by the people of my district. It has been a great pleasure to serve them personally and individually in many matters which have come up before the departments in Washington.

Since I first came to Congress I have striven to respond promptly to every reasonable request made of me by my costituents, making it a rule to answer promptly all letters and inquiries, and whenever possible to try to carry out their wishes. This has necessarily increased my work, but I have always felt that my first duty was to the people of my district.

There are few homes in my district that I have not served in some way during my term of office. I ask these many friends I have helped to sustain me at this time. The Members of Congress who have been outspoken and active in behalf of the individual rights of the people as against the wealthy interests of the country have met opposition in many of the State primaries throughout the Nation, and these forces will do anything within their power to defeat any Member of Congress who has championed human rights above dollar rights.

One of the things that weakened my resistance to the attack of influenza which I had in Washington was the vigorous fight I made on the Federal sales tax proposed at this session of Congress, which would have placed upon the people of my district and the people of the Nation as a whole a burden of over $2,000,000,000 in taxes. Having taken an active part in the defeat of this legislation and fighting to put the bulk of this tax burden upon the wealthy interests of the country has brought upon me at this time the opposition not only of these wealthy interests but of a number of the large newspapers that have gone so far as to even distort statements I have made upon the floor of the House of Representatives.

It is regrettable that the opposition to me at this time resorts to a campaign of abuse and criticism. I shall continue to fight for the rights of the people of my district, State, and Nation, and I shall never betray them.

I ask to be sustained on my record, and I hope to be continued in the service of my people.

WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL AND POSTOFFICE DAY, JULY 26

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD in connection with the bicentennial plan of celebrating postoffice day July 26.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, for every tick of the clock through the entire year more than 500 stamps bearing the likeness of George Washington are attached by Americans to mail matter intrusted to the United States Postal Service. Still that is not the most important fact as to the relationship of Washington with the Postal Service. There are 28 post offices in the United States bearing the name of Washington, a greater number than those having any other identical name, but that is not the real proof of Washington's connection with the United States Post Office.

Washington's supreme life purpose was symbolized by the Postal Service, that great agency for the promotion of intercommunication and mutual understanding. During his entire career he labored to break down barriers, to eliminate dividing lines, and to build a great community through communication. Born in the East, he died only a few miles from his birthplace, yet no man of his age visioned a mighty American empire as did Washington. As youthful surveyor, road builder, commander of armies, member of legislature and Congress, President of the Constitutional Convention, and President of the United States, he struggled to make a united nation out of disconnected fragments and out of disunion to bring unity. Naturally, indeed, he promoted the cause of postal communication, and his efforts in that direction were of the greatest value.

Washington always realized the importance of the Postal Service and he was a pathfinder and road builder in the days when the chief postal problem was that of finding ways through the wilderness. For eight years of his life Washington was Commander in Chief of the Continental Army, but for more than 50 years he was the outstanding champion of the intercommunication which alone could make possible a people's Government. In war he created nationality; in peace he fostered the intercommunication which alone could preserve the Nation.

It was the year of his birth, 1732, which saw the entrance of his native State into the intercolonial postal system. Seventy-five years before, in 1657, the Virginia Assembly had passed an act which required that "all letters shall be immediately conveyed from plantation to the place or person they are directed to, under a penalty of one hogshead of tobacco for each default." However, this was a postal regulation which applied solely within the colony, even though more drastic than the action of any other colony.

When the British Crown gave Thomas Neale a postal monopoly in 1691, providing for the establishment of an intercolonial system, with postage rates to be fixed by agreement with the legislatures, Virginia refused to enter into any agreement. Then when the Crown had taken over the monopoly in its own name and Parliament had passed Queen Ann's Act arbitrarily fixing postage rates, Virginia protested mightily. Her cry that postage rates, so established, constituted unjust taxation was the first to be heard, although the argument was raised in all the other colonies after the stamp act a half century later. Virginia kept out of the system by such drastic legislative requirements for postmasters and post riders that no one would undertake the work.

As population increased and business connections widened, Virginia's complete isolation was impossible, and in 1732 she reluctantly entered the circle of the Royal Mail.

When Washington was 5 years old Benjamin Franklin was made postmaster at Philadelphia, and soon after became surveyor of post offices. With his invincible energy he made a tour of all the post offices, over the almost impassable roads and laying out plans for improvements and betterments. So successful was his work and so apparent were the results that in 1753 Franklin became Deputy Postmaster General of the American colonial system. He remained in that position until 1774, when he was dismissed by the British Government.

During this period Washington was receiving a first-hand education as to the vital performance of the means of communication and transportation. He saw the possibilities within the crude and primitive postal system and realized that its progress depended upon better roads.

At the age of 16 he started on a surveying trip across the western mountains. He was not superstitious, for he began his journey on Friday, March 11, 1748, and returned home on the 13th of April. In his diary kept during this trip he sets down repeatedly the belief that the existing roads were the "worst ever trod by man or beast." On one occasion he had to wait for three days until a swollen river went down sufficiently for his horse to swim its torrent. Undoubtedly, this experience made a deep impression upon the youthful mind and led to his lifelong determination to help improve the all-essential means of communication between the different parts of the country. He thus set himself to help solve the biggest problem in America.

In 1754 Washington helped to build the first wagon road to the western country and laid the foundation for what is now the National Old Trails Highway, the only road built solely by the National Government and the longest stretch of paved highway in the world. This road was then known as the Cumberland road and was used by the troops commanded by Washington, which were defeated at Fort Necessity.

A year later Washington came over this road again, this time with the ill-fated expedition under General Braddock. Three years later the Braddock defeat was wiped out by General Forbes, who captured Fort Duquesne and renamed it as Fort Pitt on the site of the present-day Pittsburgh. With this victory Washington's road became the gateway of the West, and settlers poured over it to the western country.

In 1784 Washington came over the Cumberland road again and made it a central feature of his comprehensive plan for roadways and waterways between the Atlantic Colonies and the West. It was in that year that a cross post was established to Pittsburgh, and mail in ever-increasing volume went forth to help hold in the Union those settlers in western Pennsylvania who, according to Washington, were so nicely balanced in their allegiance that the touch of a feather might incline them either to the United States or to a new nation of their own. In tipping the balance toward the side of the Union the Postal Service performed benefits beyond the power of the mind to compute.

The early roads were built and maintained by the able-bodied men of the community, who gave a specified number of days to the work. On November 30, 1784, Washington wrote to Patrick Henry:

> Do you not think, my dear sir, that the credit, the saving, and the convenience of this country all require that our great roads, leading from one place to the other, should be straightened, shortened, and established by law, and the power of the county courts to alter them be withdrawn? It is equally clear to me that, putting the correct valuation upon the labor of the people who work upon the roads under the existing law and the customs of the present day, the repair of them by way of contract to be paid by assessment upon a certain district would be indefinitely less burdensome upon the community than the present mode.

In 1774 Washington introduced a bill in the Virginia House of Burgesses providing for the improvement of the Potomac River for 150 miles above tidewater. Up to the day he went to Cambridge to accept the responsibilities of Commander in Chief of the Continental Army he kept up his work as the great champion of communication. While still in command of the army at Newburgh, N. Y., he took a journey to the headwaters of the Mohawk and Susquehanna Rivers, seeking improved means of communication. When the war of independence was won and he had laid down his command in Annapolis in 1783, he renewed his life task of binding the new Nation into one unity through lines of communication. Washington had been invited by Lafayette to come to Europe to receive the plaudits of the people, but he replied that he must go into the western land to map out the highways and waterways in order that the Nation, established with such suffering, should not die from disunion. At this time also he laid out the Cumberland road and mapped the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, which was designed to connect the Atlantic with the Gulf of Mexico, through the Potomac, Youghiogheny, Monongahela, Ohio, and Mississippi Rivers. In 1785 he wrote to Edmund Randolph:

> The great objective which I wish is for the navigation of the Rivers James and Potomac to connect the western territory with the Atlantic States. All others to me are secondary.

As President, Washington continued his interest in highways of communication. He made personal tours of the country everywhere, urging better means of communication. The first macadam road in the new world was the Philadelphia and Lancaster Turnpike, built in 1792, during Washington's administration. It was the forerunner of thousands of miles of improved highways which to-day link every part of the United States into one great community.

Washington and the United States Postal Service have been alike in their willingness to encourage every new method of speedier communication and transportation.

On September 6, 1784, Washington was at Bath, Va., where he was shown the model of a boat constructed by the ingenious Mr. Rumsey "for ascending rapid current by mechanism." Without hesitation Washington gave Rumsey a certificate in which he declared:

> I have seen the model of Mr. Rumsey's boat constructed to work against stream; have examined the power upon which it acts; have been an eye witness to an actual experiment in running water of some rapidity; & do give it as my opinion (altho' I had little faith before) that he has discovered the art of propelling boats by mechanism & small manual assistance, against rapid currents;—that the discovery is of vast importance—may be of the greatest usefulness in our inland navigation—& if it succeeds, of which I have no doubt, that the value of it is greatly enhanced by the simplicity of the works, which when seen & explained to, might be executed by the most common mechanic.—
> Given under my hand at the town of Bath, county of Berkeley, in the State of Virga. this 7th day of September, 1784.

The confidence expressed by Washington in this new-fangled contrivance must be weighed against the skepticism of Benjamin Franklin, when John Fitch brought him his model of a steamboat and asked help. The eminent scientist failed for once, for he saw no good in the invention and took the inventor aside and offered him some money which Fitch indignantly refused.

Washington, whose name stood for solidity and practical wisdom, was willing to risk his reputation on his belief that steam could be harnessed to wheels. Every mail train and mail boat of to-day is proof of the sureness of his vision.

A still greater proof of Washington's faith and courage in accepting new ideas was shown in 1793, when he sponsored the first air flight in the United States. Washington was President of the United States, but in the face of the ridicule of the unthinking, he accompanied Jean Blanchard, the French balloonist, to the old prison yard in Philadelphia, which thus became America's first airport.

Washington gave Blanchard the first air mail letter in American history. It was addressed "to all to whom these presents may come," and was as follows:

The bearer hereof, Mr. Blanchard, a citizen of France, proposing to ascend in a balloon from the city of Philadelphia at 10 a. m. this day, to pass in such direction and to descend in such place as circumstances may render most convenient.

These are there to recommend to all citizens of the United States and others that in his passage, descent, return, or journeying elsewhere they oppose no hindrance or molestation to the said Mr. Blanchard; and that, on the contrary, they receive and aid him with that humanity and good will which may render honor to their country and justice to an individual so distinguished by his efforts to establish and advance his art in order to make it useful to mankind in general.

Given under my hand and seal at the city of Philadelphia, this 9th day of January, 1793, and of the independence of America the seventeenth.

Blanchard floated to Woodbury, N. J., a distance of 15 miles, in 45 minutes. If he were to return to-day, Washington would scarcely be surprised at the sight of the air mail planes carrying 8,000,000 pounds of mail a year, for he visioned such a result more than 130 years ago. In that far-off yesterday there was promise of to-day. Washington was first and foremost a promoter of the communication which is the aim of the Postal Service.

His first public activity was as a trail maker, and in his farewell address he gave his final admonition as to the value of intercommunication to those he addressed as "friends and fellow citizens." He urged the "progressive improvement of interior communication of land and water," prophesying that such action would bring about an "indissoluble community of interest as one Nation."

Time has vindicated his prophecy. His community through communication has been accomplished, not so much by constitutionalism as by the spirit of unity, in the formation of which the United States Postal Service has been chief factor. For a half century Washington was the master road-builder, in a Nation to be built on common ideals through common and complete communication.

The colonial postal service proved a vital factor in bringing about the war for American independence. What do we mean by the Revolution? Old John Adams wrote to Thomas Jefferson in 1815, "The war? That was no part of the Revolution; it was only an effect and consequence of it. The Revolution was in the minds of the people and this was effected from 1760 to 1775, in the course of 15 years, before a drop of blood was drawn at Lexington." The Postal Service had its full share in creating that Revolution in mind. It was an intercolonial system of communication and the improvements of the roads and the increase in messages brought about mutual understanding and common counsel. Massachusetts would never have defied the power of the British King if she had not felt that Virginia would be at her side. Pennsylvania would not have joined the great uprising if she had not felt sure of the cooperation of New York and New Jersey. There could have been no Continental Congress without the intercommunication made possible by the Postal Service. Paul Revere was a post rider and there were many others like him who were riding with messages of warning and sympathy and help. Besides this situation, the high postage rates enforced by the British Parliament made the colonists refuse to send a great part of their letters under the seal of the Royal Mail. The American post riders carried the letters at a fraction of the regular postage charges and in this way the colonists could be patriotic and save money at the same time.

The most graphic picture of the Postal Service of this critical time is found in the Journal of Hugh Finlay, who was British postal surveyor over the entire territory from Quebec to St. Augustine. After he had visited many offices and talked with postmasters and post riders, he sent a message to London in which he said: "These Americans are to be governed by laws of their own framing and no other." This was in 1773 and it embodied the coming Revolution in a sentence. He pointed out that it is a delight for the colonists to give their mail and payment to the rider, ignoring the King's monopoly. He stated that "if an information were lodged against these violators—but an informer would get tarred and feathered—no jury would find the fact." He found that "it is the constant practice of all the riders between New York and Boston to defraud the revenue of as much as they can in pocketing the postage of all way letters. Every postmaster making complaint begs that his name be never mentioned as having made any of these representations."

Finley found stage coaches on the road between Boston and Portsmouth in 1773, which was 11 years before they were introduced in England. Six horses were used and the arrival of the mail coach heralded by the horn which only the mail carrier could use, was an important event to the inhabitants of every village.

Events led on to the outbreak of the Revolution. There was communication and there was a schedule of postage rates which gave grounds for the charge of oppressive taxation. On Christmas Day, 1775, the postmaster of New York, formally announced the termination of the Royal Mail, and the American Postal Service held the field exclusively.

George Washington was a Member of the Continental Congress which established the United States Post Office. On May 29, 1775, he voted for the creation of a committee headed by Benjamin Franklin, which was to draft the plans for the constitutional post office, to displace the Royal Mail. When that committee reported on July 26, and the resolution creating the United States Postal Service was enacted, Washington was in Boston as Commander in Chief of the Continental Army.

The Continental Congress itself was really a meeting place of the committee of correspondence of the several Colonies, which had been organized in the words of Patrick Henry, "in order to maintain correspondence with sister colonies." In a vital sense this world-shaking Congress grew out of the need for postal communication. One of the resolutions of this Congress declared that "communication of intelligence with frequency and dispatch from one part to another of this extreme continent is essentially requisite to its safety."

During the years that tried men's souls the National Assembly took time to enact many measures dealing with the Postal Service. The first act dealt with the pay of the deputies or postmasters, and they were allowed to retain 20 per cent of the revenues collected up to $1,000 and 10 per cent of the amount above that sum. On October 17, 1782, it was decreed that the postmasters might have 20 per cent on all sums collected, and 11 days later it was provided that they should have allowance for franked letters as though they had paid postage.

One of the earliest acts was that which gave the right of franking letters to General Washington and his officers and this was later broadened to include all soldiers of the Continental Army. The ordinance of October 18, 1782, provided that letters, packets, and dispatches to and from Members while actually attending Congress, to and from the Commander in Chief of the Armies, or commander of a separate army, and to and from the heads of the Departments of Finance, War, and Foreign Affairs, sent on public service, should be carried free of postage.

The postage rates during the Continental Congress period were substantially as follows: On a single letter carried 30 miles, 6 cents; from 30 to 80 miles, 10 cents; from 80 to 150 miles, 12½ cents; from 150 to 400 miles, 18¾ cents; over 400 miles, 25 cents.

The dead-letter office was established October 17, 1777, by a resolution which provided for the appointment of an inspector of dead letters, with a salary of $100 a year. This office was required to examine all dead letters at the end of each quarter and to communicate to Congress any which contained inimical schemes or intelligence. He was prohibited from taking copies of any letters or divulging their contents to any but Congress or those whom they might assign for the purpose.

In the ordinance of October 18, 1782, the postmasters were required to publish the list of unclaimed letters at the expiration of the quarter. If they still remained unclaimed, these letters were to be sent to the dead-letter office.

In 1784 the Congress provided for contracts for the carrying of mail by stage coach even at much higher rates than the same mail could have been carried by post riders. It was declared that the purpose of the act was to encourage passenger-carrying vehicles between the various towns.

The Post Office Establishment during this period when the Continental Congress operated under the Articles of Confederation was administered by a Postmaster General named by Congress.

Benjamin Franklin served from July 26, 1775, to November 7, 1776, and then gave way to his son-in-law, Richard Bache. This postal chief was succeeded in turn by Ebenezer Hazard on January 28, 1782, and he held office until the Constitution went into force in 1789.

The Postal Service then was only an acorn, but it contained the germ of the mighty institution we prize so highly to-day.

In March, 1776, Deputy Postmaster Ebenezer Hazard, of New York City, who later became Postmaster General, sent a memorial to Congress stating that he had no money to employ an assistant and was compelled to leave New York in order to keep near the headquarters of the Army "who are almost the only persons now receiving mail." He asked for a horse to avoid the indignity of following the Army on foot.

Out of Washington's desire for communication came the Constitution of the United States. The assembly of 1786 at Annapolis, which adjourned to meet in Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia the next year, was called the aftermath of conferences at Mount Vernon. Action by the States was required in carrying out the highway and waterway plans of Washington. Representatives gathered in the Maryland city and decided that fundamental questions of government were involved in the interstate communication. When the delegates met in Philadelphia by common consent the work of framing a new character of government was undertaken.

The fatal defect of the postal system under the Articles of Confederation had been the control of the mails within the separate States by the States themselves. The National Government was powerless to enforce uniform regulations, and chaos resulted.

This same weakness prevailed throughout the entire framework of government, until all thinking men realized there must be either remedy or collapse.

The Constitutional Convention formulated the remedy by framing the Constitution of the United States, which solved the postal problem by giving exclusive control to the National Congress.

George Washington was chairman of the convention, the unanimous choice of the delegates. No one can doubt that he helped to make sure that there should be no divided authority in the great national enterprise of the post office.

There was no disagreement on this vital point, and two amendments to provide that Government revenues should be raised through postage charges were speedily and decisively rejected.

In the State convention called to ratify the new charter of Government the clause dealing with the post office was never attacked. It was universally agreed that the Post-Office Establishment should be a national enterprise, and that it should not be used as a revenue-producing agency.

When Washington assumed the duties of the Presidency he named the first Postmaster General under the Constitution and the Postal Service entered upon its long career as a national service institution.

As President he was a consistent and continuous friend of the Post Office Establishment. In his first message to Congress, on January 8, 1790, he earnestly emphasized the importance of "facilitating the intercourse between the distant parts of our country by a due attention to the post office and post roads." "Knowledge is the surest basis in every country for public happiness," he declared, and none knew better than he the value of the post office in diffusing knowledge among the people.

In his message of October 25, 1791, he again advocated encouragement and promotion of the Postal Service.

The importance of the post office and post roads—on a plane sufficiently liberal and comprehensive as they respect the expedition, safety, and facility of communication, is increased by their instrumentality in diffusing a knowledge of the laws and proceedings of the Government, which, while it contributes to the security of the people, serves also to guard them against the effects of misrepresentation and misconception. The establishment of additional cross posts, especially to some of the important points in the western and northern parts of the Union, can not fail to be of material utility.

He declared—

He returned to the subject of his message of November 6, 1792, with a plea for easier transmission of newspapers through the mails.

It is represented—

He said—

that some provisions in the law which established the post office operate against the transmission of newspapers to distant parts of the country. Should this, upon inquiry, be found to be a fact, a full conviction of the importance of facilitating the circulation of political intelligence and information will, I doubt not, lead to the application of a remedy.

The House of Representatives, in its response to this message, expressed its determination to carry out the President's suggestion, since newspapers are—

Justly reckoned among the surest means of preventing the degeneracy of a free government as well as recommending every salutatory public measure to the confidence and cooperation of all virtuous citizens.

No public man in American history has ever felt to a greater degree the whips of scorpions of unjust newspaper criticism than George Washington. The present-day attacks upon officials are like a gentle breeze compared to the tornado of press assaults upon Washington. Still Washington builded upon the faith that a free press and a despotic government can not live together. Once he declared that the cry against Jay's treaty in certain newspapers was "like that against a mad dog." Yet he trusted the common sense of the people; and when the House of Representatives had voted for the appropriations necessary to carry out the treaty, he declared, "Nothing but the torrent of petitions would have procured the favorable vote."

So strong was his conviction that there should be the widest possible dissemination of political information that he was willing to have newspapers carried through the mails free of all postal charges. In his message of December 3, 1793, he said: "But here I can not forbear to recommend a repeal of the tax on the transportation of public prints. There is no resource so firm for the Government of the United States as the affection of the people, guided by an enlightened policy; and to this primary good nothing can conduce more than a faithful representation of public proceedings diffused without restraint throughout the United States."

To this plea the House of Representatives responded a few days later: "We can not refrain from particularly expressing our concurrence in the policy of removing any impediments that may be found in the way of a faithful representation of public proceedings throughout the United States, being persuaded with you that no resource is so firm for the Government of the United States."

President Washington repeatedly urged in his messages the establishment of a national university. In all the years since Congress has never authorized such an institution. Still, in its promotion of the Postal Service for more than 140 years Congress has, in effect, established a national university. The post office, of course, does not originate knowledge, but neither does a university. Both gather knowledge and transmit it to those who wish it. To any man who can read the Postal Service opens up the world of knowledge. Whether he lives in a city or isolated section, for a 2-cent stamp he can send out his call for knowledge. The newspaper, magazine, or mail-order catalogue; the correspondence courses, the books from the library, or the publications of the Government will be delivered to his door by this postal university. During the eight years of Washington's administration the Postal Service assumed its present character. It was but an acorn, but within it was the germ of the mighty oak of to-day, whose branches reach out in many directions, bringing benefits to more than 120,000,000 Americans.

On September 26, 1789, Samuel Osgood, of Massachusetts, was named by Washington the first Postmaster General under the Constitution, and Jonathan Burrall was made First Assistant Postmaster General. The seat of the new Government was in New York City and Washington occupied the Osgood home on Cherry Street, near Franklin Square, from February 23, 1789, to May 1, 1790.

Postmaster General Osgood served until August 12, 1791, when Timothy Pickering, of Pennsylvania, succeeded him, and Charles Burrall became Assistant Postmaster General. On February 25, 1795, Joseph Habersham became Postmaster General, serving throughout the remainder of Washington's administration and all of John Adam's administration.

The first report of Postmaster General Osgood was dated December 9, 1789, but it was not included in the bound reports in the Congressional Library. Instead, No. 1 in the bound reports is that which is dated January 20, 1790. I can discover no reason for this omission, although it is true that the report for 1790 contains practically the text of the earlier report in addition to many more details.

These early reports are addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, since the Postmaster General was not a member of the Cabinet and did not take his place in that body until President Jackson's administration.

The first report points out that the Postmaster General was responsible for everything. He appointed the postmasters, made all contracts for carrying the mails, opened all new offices, and established all new routes. The difficulty inherent in such a situation is quaintly expressed by General Osgood. "On the accountability of the Postmaster General," he observes, "I beg leave to observe that no man can, however great his industry, however cautious and sagacious he may be in his appointments, without subjecting himself to a certain loss, be accountable for the conduct of his deputies. If he has not a salary sufficient to compensate such loss, he must transact the business and keep the accounts in such a manner that the Treasury shall not be able to charge him with more money than he chooses to be charged with, which has in fact been the case, I believe, since the Revolution. Or, he may hold the office until he shall find he can not preserve his reputation and credit and then, if he is an honest man, he will resign."

The two horns of his dilemma were exceedingly sharp. He must either juggle his accounts or resign his place. General Osgood for a year or more found he could remain as the postal chief and retain his reputation and credit.

In his second report, that of January 20, 1790, General Osgood went into great detail as to the Postal Service, but took great care not to make statements which might be deemed too positive. He ventured to say that there "may be so few letters written that it will not amount to anything considerable." He insisted that "franking of letters may have been carried too far." He thought that "the rates of postage may have been too high in some cases and too low in others." He suggested that "stage drivers and post riders may have carried many letters outside the mails." Also he believed it might possibly be true that "postmasters may have consulted their own interests in preference to those of the public."

As to all of these possibilities, General Osgood was confident that a remedy could be applied for all save for that of the lack of letters. He went into a lengthy calculation to prove the size of the task ahead. The receipts were at the rate of $25,000 a year and yet there were demands for service which would require a considerably greater sum. In order to have revenue of $500,000 at some time in the future, it would be necessary for 100,000 persons to send 30 letters each through the mails each year. Or 25,000 persons would have to send 120 letters each. The old postal chief was frankly pessimistic over the possibility of such a craze for letter writing. Yet the fact is that there are the equivalent of 287 letters carried through the mails each year for the 122,000,000 men, women, and children in the United States.

General Osgood pointed out that postage rates were unjustly burdensome in some cases. He declared that while every part of the country should have easy and cheap access to the seat of government, a single letter from Georgia to New York cost thirty-three ninetieths of a dollar and thus prohibited Georgians from keeping in touch with Congress.

In a letter to the House of Representatives dated April 26, 1790, General Osgood called attention to another difficulty and suggested a remedy. He stated that the department had no map of the roads of the United States and was at a great disadvantage in letting contracts. He submitted a plan to measure the roads by a perambulator at the rate of one-eighth of a dollar per mile. Since there were about 3,000 miles of roads, the cost would be about $375. The postal chief, while recognizing the magnitude of this expense, still ventured to urge Congress to act favorably "in the public interest."

The statement of General Osgood to the House of Representatives showing the list of post offices, the receipts and expenditures from October 5, 1789, to January 5, 1790, is a graphic picture of this infant service, which has developed into the mightiest organization of its kind in the world.

There were 75 post offices, and they reported receipts of $7,510.65 for the quarter. The postmasters' salaries amounted to about $1,900, which left a revenue of $5,533. When the contractors' compensation for carrying the mails was paid, there was a deficit for this first three months of postal history under the new Government amounting to $34.84. It may be seen that the deficits which have aroused so much comment recently had a very early beginning.

In the list of post offices, Virginia was in first place, having 15.

There are several post offices now which have more revenue every day than the entire Postal System brought in in a year in Osgood's time. Still, the seed of the present enterprise was there, and only time and encouragement were needed to bring it to complete fruition.

Postmaster General Pickering submitted a report for the year ending October 5, 1791, which showed that the revenues were $42,255.14. The prize contractor at this time was John Holmes, who carried the mails between Alexandria and Suffolk, Va., from Richmond to Norfolk, and from Suffolk to Savannah. He received in all approximately $11,000 a year.

As far as the official records go, General Pickering's main difficulty was the attempt of New Jersey to levy a tax of $400 a year on stage lines which carried the mails. Vigorously he protested to Congress against this interference with the mails and imposition upon mail contractors.

If the sums exacted from the proprietors of the stages—

were expended in reparations of the roads, no passengers would complain of paying enhanced prices for safer and easier seats in the stages, but such an appropriation is not even thought of. The avowed design is to increase the revenues of that State. And thus the citizens of the United States have to purchase permission to travel on the roads of New Jersey. By a reasonable computation the annual increase of transporting the mails six times a week between Philadelphia and New York would be $2,400. But the contractor has engaged for that sum to carry it for one year and five months. He was induced to offer such moderate terms because he intended to erect a line of stages and hoped to be relieved from the imposition of the tax.

In the records is found a letter from Charles Burrall, Assistant Postmaster General, which describes better than volumes could do, the conditions in these beginning days of the United States Post Office. His letter is dated December 20, 1794, and is addressed to the House of Representatives. He explained that contracts had been made for two mail routes in Georgia and South Carolina. He stated that the service was understood to be in operation on October 1, but on November 4 "I received information that no provision had been made for the service." Inquiries developed the fact that the contractor, Thomas Sumpter, had been busy in Philadelphia, securing the contract, and while there had fallen ill. He had sent a letter to his father to get the mails started, but the letter had never been received. One of the earliest alibis in postal history to explain delays in the service is that of Mr. Burrall when he explained to Congress:

The failure in the execution of Mr. Sumpter's contract was not to have been suspected, because of the known ability of himself and his father to perform it.

When Washington assumed the Presidency of the United States, there were only 75 post offices in the entire domain of the new Nation and the post roads covered a distance of 1,175 miles.

When he turned over the reins of office to John Adams, there were 554 post offices and the mileage of post roads had grown to 16,100. The revenue had increased from about $37,000 to $214,000 annually.

When the first Congress had assembled in City Hall, New York, under Speakership of Frederick Muhlenberg, of Pennsylvania, it undertook by resolution to continue the Post Office Establish under the regulations which had been enacted by the Continental Congress. The measure which provided for this extension was signed by President Washington on September 22, 1789.

Under these provisions Members of Congress had the franking privilege on letters they mailed but not on those they received. There is extant a letter from Congressman Jonathan Dayton, of New Jersey, in 1789, to a constituent, in which he said:

Do not send your packets by mail; I was obliged to pay 6 shillings and 8 pence for the last one.

The postage rates, high as they were under the Continental Congress, were continued in force, and as a matter of fact were carried in succeeding legislation with only trifling changes for more than 50 years.

Acts dealing with postmasters' salaries were enacted in 1792, 1794, and 1797, each one increasing in small degree the percentage allowed on revenues collected. In 1792 the maximum for postmasters was $1,800 a year, but two years later it was provided that the postmaster at New York City might receive $2,700 and the postmaster at Philadelphia $3,500.

The last increase was in part due to a report by Representative Thatcher, who informed the House that a great many postmasters had resigned on account of inadequate compensation. He urged a "moderate advance to give them satisfaction and to secure faithful officers for the department."

The first act of Congress which provided generally for the post office was that of February 20, 1792. It established postage rates, fixed the salaries of postmasters, dealt with franked mail and other matters connected with the postal service.

On April 4, 1796, a committee of the House reported after an investigation in various complaints of the Postal Service. The committee stated that printers put newspapers in the mail before the ink had dried and they became a wet mass so that it was "impossible to ascertain to whom or what office they were directed or to read their contents." These were the first wet newspapers in the United States.

Another cause of complaints was the practice of throwing out the contents of a portmanteau at post offices in order to find the mail for that office. "At such times," said the committee, "papers and small packages are taken away by persons present at the opening of the portmanteau, without the knowledge or privity of the postmaster or the carriers of the mail."

The first provision for delivery of mail by letter carriers is contained in the act of May 8, 1794. It provided that the Postmaster General might select the offices where letter carriers were to be employed. The pay of the letter carriers was a 2-cent fee for each letter, to be paid by the addressee.

The last postal measure of Congress during Washington's administration was the act of March 3, 1797, the day before John Adams assumed the Presidency. This law provided that all letters and packets to George Washington, after the expiration of his term of office and during his life should be received and conveyed by post free of postage. By the act of March 2, 1799, such privilege was extended to all mail both to and from George Washington. After Washington's death, Congress granted the franking privilege to Martha Washington during her lifetime.

It will be most appropriate to celebrate Post Office Day in connection with the bicentennial of the birth of George Washington. Great events crowded the calendar of that dynamic year of 1775, but not one was more important in its effects than the establishment of the United States Postal Service on July 26.

There will be a series of special postage stamps issued in 12 denominations, from one-half cent to 10 cents, inclusive, each paying tribute to the Father of his Country.

The one-half-cent stamp will bear the likeness taken from the miniature painted by Charles Willson Peale.

The 1-cent stamp will contain a reproduction of the profile bust of Washington by Jean Antoine Houdon, made in 1785.

The 1½-cent stamp will bear the Virginia colonel's portrait by Peale. The 2-cent stamp will have the Stuart likeness of Washington.

The 3, 4, and 5 cent stamps will bear likeness of Washington as painted by Peale.

The 6 and 7 cent stamps will contain reproductions of the Trumbull portraits.

The 8-cent stamp will have the reproduction of the crayon drawing of Charles Mekrin.

The 9-cent stamp will have the Williams portrait and the 10-cent stamp will have the Gilbert Stuart portrait of 1795.

There will also be a series of Washington Bicentennial envelopes. This issue of Washington stamps and envelopes will form a splendid memorial to Washington. I have suggested in addition to this program that July 26 be especially celebrated in 1932 as the birthday anniversary of the United States Post Office, in remembrance of Washington's close connection with this great service enterprise. The Bicentennial Commission has enthusiastically accepted the suggestion, so that we will witness for the first time in history a nation-wide celebration of the post-office birth date. In its suggested program for the nation-wide George Washington celebration, the Bicentennial Commission has made July 26 Post Office Day, with this comment:

A celebration on July 26, 1932, of the one hundred and fifty-seventh anniversary of the birth of the United States Postal Service will be especially appropriate in view of the special interest of General Washington in this branch of the Government. Congress on July 26, 1775, passed a resolution to establish the Continental Post, naming Benjamin Franklin as first Postmaster General. General Washipgton was one of the founders of the Postal Service. From the age of 16 until his death he was the great champion of communication. He guarded the Postal Service during the Revolution and he named the first Postmaster General appointed after the adoption of the Constitution. Repeatedly in his messages to Congress he urged the extension of the service.

Special services could be held on July 26 in the 75 places where post offices were located in 1789, when Washington was inaugurated. One of the old-time mail coaches could be started from the northernmost of these cities and driven to the post office farthest south, with driver and equipment as they were in 1789. Appropriate celebrations might be staged on that day by every post office in the United States in honor of the birthday of the service.

Without Washington and the Postal Service the phrase "the United States" could never have been fulfilled. Both have been creative powers leading Americans to more abundant life and greater unity.

America as we know it to-day can not be conceived without the Postal Service. Let the Postal Service cease to function for one day and the interests of many millions would be injured. It is the very heart of our American system of government and business.

From a little service having only a few dollars a year in revenue the United States Post Office has grown to an enterprise with $700,000,000 in revenues. The few post riders and postmasters of 1789 have become an army of 371,000 servants of the public good. Yet the service is fundamentally the same and very few of the new developments were not visioned by George Washington. He sowed for our reaping; he laid out the paths we have followed.

No nation is ever established without a leader who sees his country as one unit, bound together by common ideals and a common purpose, with comprehensive lines of communication, for the diffusion of knowledge of those ideals and that purpose.

George Washington was that leader for America. Like Moses of old he stood alone on the mountain top; and though the wilderness was all around him, he saw a goodly land which he believed with all his heart was to become the glory of the whole earth. His mind visioned highways and waterways—yes, and railways and airways, too—over which would speed a nation's messengers linking great cities and little hamlets into one mighty neighborhood.

When George Washington died the United States Post Office had become an institution built of solid rock. It is true that it was so primitive that the news of the passing of the great patriot could not be conveyed from Mount Vernon to Boston, a distance of 485 miles, in less than 10 days, even though the post riders spurred night and day through the winter storm. Still there were needed only improved methods of communication to bring about the present commonplace of mail from Washington to Boston in less than four hours.

The path led in the right direction, and there was no need to retrace steps, but only to go forward. From 1799 there has been steady progress with the Postal Service achieving a noble record creating a mighty institution.

The post office has been the creation of unnumbered human minds and hands, but high on the roll of its architects and builders stands the name of Washington. On its first feeble marches he was leader of the vanguard, and the roads he built for the future must not be forgotten in the present.

It seems to me that when the people of a democracy like ours have accumulated experience from Washington to Hoover along one consistent line, there should be such agreement on successful policies that there can be no room for chance or change. I believe with Victor Hugo that "if God had intended that man should go backward, He would have given him an eye in the back of his head."

The question as to whether the United States Post Office is a service institution or a money-making agency should not to-day be open to debate and disagreement. The Washington who urged that a great branch of mail matter be carried free and who took pride in the diffusion of governmental information without postage charge, would not be panic stricken over a deceptive postal deficit. He would never hesitate between postal service and postal curtailment.

He would urge ever-increasing facilities, evermore comprehensive service, firm in the faith that the greatest of all national dividends is not money but enlightenment and understanding. Washington was of that immortal company who love light as the best assurance of liberty and justice for humankind.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, if we are going to have a very long program to-day, I think we ought to have a quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. A quorum comes first, because we have about 800 bills on the Private Calendar that ought to be properly considered, and we can not handle them properly without having the Members here, and I join with the gentleman from New York in demanding that a quorum should be present.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. I have obtained important information which would indicate that the Ways and Means Committee of the House, as well as the Finance Committee of the Senate, were deceived by misinformation given them by certain witnesses who appeared before them and this is the only means of getting it before the Senate.

Mr. BLANTON. Could not the gentleman do that much better on Monday when the entire membership will be present?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can not appear on the floor of the Senate, and they are not having any hearings. It is very important that this be gotten before them to-day.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What is the nature of the gentleman's information?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is on the stock-transfer tax.

Mr. GREEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I shall not object to the gentleman from New York being given 10 minutes if I can follow him for 3 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] wishes to make some statement in reference to the program.

Mr. RAINEY. I want to say that it is important that the statement by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] be made to-day. I know what it is, and I hope he will be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

THE STOCK TRANSFER TAX

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, during the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee of the House on the tax bill the subject of a stock-transfer tax was presented. Comparisons were made between the proposed tax and taxes in other countries, and I am sure that many gentlemen will recall that officials of the New York Stock Exchange stated that if a stock-transfer tax were imposed they could easily transfer their transactions to the London exchange and the Canadian exchange. The stock-transfer tax came up toward the end of the hearing before the Committee on Ways and Means, and this House passed a tax of one-quarter of 1 per cent. It was a very live subject before the Senate Finance Committee in its hearings on the bill, and the reason I asked for time this morning is that they are now considering the tax bill on the floor of the Senate.

It is quite necessary that the Senate should be informed on the stock-transfer tax in England. The reason is that it has not received correct information. Were the Senate committee still in session I would appear before it and present the information that I have. This is the only means now available to inform the Senate that when the president of the New York Stock Exchange appeared before it and was asked specifically to furnish the committee with information on stock-transfer taxes and taxes on transactions on the London Stock Exchange, the committee was deceived. Anyone reading the testimony of Mr. Richard Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, and the table of taxes which he put in, omitting the real stock-transfer tax, can not escape the conclusion that a willful misrepresentation was made, a deliberate and willfu omission, in order to deceive the Senate in the hope of defeating the stock-transfer tax placed in the bill by the House. The House transfer-tax provision was eliminated by the Senate committee.

The president of the New York Stock Exchange, Mr. Whitney, appeared before the Finance Committee, and in reply to a question as to the stock-transfer tax in England stated that he had the information, that he would supply the Senate committee with the information; and on April 18, 1932, he furnished the information—which will be found on page 1231 of the Senate hearings—sent it with a covering letter of that date, prepared a comparative statement of the tax in Canada and the proposed tax in the United States and the English tax. When he gave the English tax he submitted only what is known as the contract-note stamp tax, which is only 1 cent on stock transactions of $75 to $150, while the proposed House tax, coupled with the New York State tax, would be 41½ cents. By so doing he deliberately misrepresented the English tax, because he must have known, and his experts must have known—as they deal on the London exchange—that there were two additional taxes which were maliciously and willfully omitted from the table submitted by Mr. Whitney, the president of the New York Stock Exchange, to the Finance Committee of the Senate. He thereby led the Senate committee to believe that there was no stock-transfer tax and that the only tax was what is known as the contract-note stamp tax.

This is quite in keeping with the omission of information in the Kreuger-Toll bond issue, in stock flotations, and in the daily paid publicity stock brokers send to their customers in order to sell securities and stock at inflated, artificial prices. As a witness to that I call upon the millions of American investors who have lost billions and billions of dollars since 1929.

When I saw this statement—I knew there was a transfer tax in England; I had referred to it on the floor of the House—I asked the State Department to inquire here in this country from the British Embassy. The State Department informed me that there was a stock-transfer tax in England on stock-exchange transactions, according to the information which they had obtained. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, this is in conflict with the phrase that has been repeatedly given to members of the Ways and Means Committee and to the Senate Finance Committee—that "transactions carried on in the ordinary course of business between members of the stock exchange are excepted from the British transfer tax."

The matter was vitally important, in the face of these contradictory interpretations from such important and authoritative sources. I therefore asked the State Department to cable London and get the actual correct information right at the stock exchange.

I did not want to take any chance whatsoever in charging the New York Stock Exchange officials with deliberately misleading the Senate Finance Committee and our own Treasury Department in stating that they did not think such a tax would be workable. The State Department was kind enough to cable London, and I have here a reply, dated May 19, 1932:

Transfer tax is 1s. for each £5 sterling or fraction thereof up to £25 sterling; 5s. for each £25 sterling or fraction thereof up to £300 sterling; 10s. for each £50 sterling or fraction thereof above £300 sterling. These taxes apply to both stock exchange and private sales. Short and long transactions subject to transfer tax only when terminated by payment and transfer of title. No separate tax applicable to private sales. For carry-over sales see commercial attaché cable to Commerce No. 391, dated March 3.

ANDREW W. MELLON.

And, Mr. Speaker, that is signed by a financial authority—Andrew W. Mellon, present ambassador to the Court of St. James, and former Secretary of the Treasury, himself.

Here is the cable referred to, which was sent to the Department of Commerce. It is dated March 3, 1932, and it becomes important by reason of the fact that the Treasury Department officials appeared before the Finance Committee a month later and must have had this information, which the Department of Commerce tells me was availble to the Treasury Department. The cablegram is as follows:

[Transcript of cable No. 391, to Department of Commerce, March 3, 1932]

Contract-note stamp required on all contracts evidencing purchase of stock on stock exchange.

Both contract-note stamp and conveyance (transfer) stamp required in all cases of purchase of registered stock involving conveyance (transfer) thereof to the stock broker or banker, to be held as security for customer on time or margin.

Conveyance (transfer) stamp not required when stock purchases involve bearer stocks and stock that pass by indorsements.

Authorities indicate that title passes to customer in case of purchase made by banker or stock broker for customer on time or margin.

Broker and banker have what is known here as a possessory lien and stock to cover debt of customer incurred in connection with the purchase and for general balance owing the banker or stock-broker.

The procedure known as carry-over provides a method of continuing a stock purchase from one settlement to another. With each continuance a continuing contract note is executed requiring a contract-note stamp.

COOPER,
Commercial Attaché, London Embassy.

They clear over there every 14 days. If there is an order for a sale or purchase of stock and that is not cleared, that is "continued" and requires another contract-note stamp, and as soon as the sale is executed, whether short or on margin, or otherwise, the stock-transfer tax applies.

I will, with the permission given me, insert a comparative statement in the RECORD showing a comparison of the present British stock-transfer tax with what was proposed in the House.

To give you an idea, on a stock selling for $10 the British sale tax would be 2½ per cent. Under the tax bill passed by the House it would be one-fourth of 1 cent and with the minimum provision of the House bill it would only be 4 cents. The minimum in England is 1 per cent, while the highest that was proposed here was one-quarter of 1 per cent.

To illustrate, a $200 sale of stock in England would pay $2.50, while under the House bill it would only pay 50 cents.

I will insert the entire comparison in the RECORD. The following comparison is based upon the sale of one share of stock of $100 par value:

Selling price ($100 par value)	British tax (transfer)		United States tax

(This information was sent to us by L. H. Parker, chief of staff, Joint Committee on Internal Revenue.)

I also insert the following table for comparison of the figures given to the Senate Finance Committee by Richard P. Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, and the true transfer tax figures on transfers of securities in England as furnished by Mr. L. H. Parker, chief of staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation.

Comparative table showing figures given to Senate Finance Committee by Mr. Richard P. Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, contrasted with true figures regarding English tax on transfer of nonnegotiable securities

[1] As given by Mr. L. H. Parker, chief of staff, Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation.

Now, gentlemen, I submit that the tax in England is five times what we propose on a $200 sale and proportionately larger on other stock transfers. Responsible officials of the New York Stock Exchange appeared before the committee and only disclosed one of the three taxes applicable to the transaction on the London Stock Exchange. It is not only startling and shocking but it is something which should not remain uncensured. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has expired.

PUBLIC BUILDING

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, my purpose is to offer to the House, as a portion of such relief plan as the House may later determine, a public building bill. It is a bill which it was my pleasure to introduce at the last session of Congress—and also at this session of Congress—which would provide for distribution, by congressional districts, of such funds or portion of such funds, as we may have appropriated for Federal construction.

I believe that the bill will be of special interest to my colleagues, and, at the conclusion of my remarks, I shall ask permission to print it in the RECORD. The bill is H. R. 7120 and provides for construction of post-office buildings to relieve unemployment and economic depression, and for other purposes. It would expend about one-half million dollars in each congressional district, giving buildings for practically all second and third class offices. It provides for local architects, local engineers, local material, where possible, and for local labor. All sections of the country would benefit equally and alike under its provisions. If the Garner plan for relief is adopted by the Congress, then this bill, if adopted, will carry out that portion of the plan pertaining to the proposed Federal construction program.

In addition to this bill I desire, if I may, to again call the attention of the House to the importance of at least a partial reimbursement for losses sustained by Florida growers during the Mediterranean fruit-fly campaign. I hope to address the House on that subject next week.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in my remarks this bill for Federal building.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would not the gentleman be willing to refer to the bill by number instead of printing the entire bill in the RECORD? It is five or six pages. If the gentleman will just refer to it by number the membership will be able to get copies of the bill. Therefore I shall have to object.

Mr. GREEN. All copies have been exhausted.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

STOCK-TRANSFER TAX

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object to this request; but I will make a point of order when the gentleman finishes.

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOOM. Mr. Speaker, of course no Member of this House—and certainly not I—could have any possible objection to a contribution for the information of the House, and perhaps the information of the Senate, of the character that was given to us a moment ago by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. I have not had an opportunity to check on the facts presented by the gentleman, but I have no doubt they are substantially correct. Whether misrepresentations were made before the Finance Committee of the Senate by a representative of the New York Stock Exchange, it seems to me is hardly a matter for very prolonged discussion in the House, but might better be presented to another forum, preferably the Senate itself.

However, Mr. Speaker, I arose to say that if we are to pattern our revenue system after the revenue system of Great Britain we have yet far to go. We will be on the road toward very serious consequences in the United States if we adopt that policy. Great Britain fortunately, with its homogeneous population devoted to the single cause of preserving and saving that country from the verge of bankruptcy, has been able to impose most drastic taxes upon all of its lines of business and classes of property.

By way of comparison, I might say that under the present income tax law in the United States, a man with a wife and one dependent, having an income of $5,000, at the present time pays $12.38 income tax. In Great Britain he would pay $650.22. A person with an income of $10,000, similarly situated, in the United States under the present law would pay $92.25, while in Great Britain he would pay $1,799.93. Under the pending revenue bill, as passed by the House, the corresponding payments would be $29.50 and $194; and under the proposals of the Senate Finance Committee they would be $44.25 and $271, respectively.

We have not attempted to impose any such taxes upon the people of the United States, nor have we attempted to impose upon business, whether it be the business of the stock exchanges or of the produce exchanges, or the business of the farmer or of the manufacturer or the merchant or anyone else, any such burdens. Let us hope we may not be compelled to impose upon our people any such taxes as are imposed upon the people of Great Britain.

We should rather rejoice than complain that it has not yet become necessary in this country, in comparison with the unfortunate tax burdens of other nations, to practically cripple commerce, agriculture, industry, trade, or even the promotion of the arts and sciences among our people.

Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks, let me say that I do not believe the Treasury Department made any effort to advise either the House Ways and Means Committee or the Senate Finance Committee as to the British tax on stock transfers. I am advised that the system of handling stock sales and making settlements of them is so different in England from what it is in the United States that it is hard to make a fair comparison. There was really nothing new in Ambassador Mellon's cable of May 19, presented here by the gentleman from New York. The transfer tax, amounting roughly to 1 per cent, as the cable states, applies to "short and long transactions subject to transfer tax only when terminated by payment and transfer of title." On the other hand, cable No. 391, from Mr. Cooper, commercial attaché at London, states:

> Conveyance (transfer) stamp not required when stock purchases involve bearer stocks and stocks that pass by indorsements.

To determine to what proportion of all stock transactions the tax of 1 per cent applies, it would be necessary to ascertain what part of those transactions involve transfers of title and what part relate to other changes of ownership or control. The extent to which transfers of title are required in Great Britain in the case of registered shares is understood to be greatly reduced by the custom of having fortnightly settlements between brokers, so that what is required to be transferred at the time of settlement is the net balance instead of the aggregate volume of daily transactions. In all events, neither the amount of the British tax nor its method of application seems deserving of enthusiastic emulation by our Government.

THE TRAGEDY OF THE LINDBERGH CHILD

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an editorial in the form of a letter appearing in the St. Louis Star of May 13, 1932, the subject matter of which is worthy of the consideration of the American people.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following:

A LETTER

TO CHARLES A. LINDBERGH:

To you and Mrs. Lindbergh has come a tragedy which turns the flame of life to ashes. The Nation would share and by sharing lighten a grief that is yours alone. Yet it is the Nation that has brought this grief upon you, and with all their sympathy and sorrow the people of this country will turn to-morrow to their tasks and pleasures, prevented by what little mercy there is in Providence from retaining the keenness of any suffering but their own.

The Nation brought this grief upon you by creating and nurturing the Caliban life that crept upon your home. This country created an institution of crime, played with it, surrendered to it, laughed at it even when it splashed the streets with blood—and when, in a different and nobler mood, the people seized upon your glorious exploit in aviation to make you a national hero, they unwittingly marked you and your household for the attention of the criminal demon they had nurtured.

Is nothing to come of this but the memory, softened by time, which you will bear?

At the present moment the American people are running true to form. Sincerely, emotionally, they cry that crime must be eradicated. They arm themselves to kill Caliban. Congress will pass a law, valuable in its terms, to help the States combat kidnaping. Police, prosecutors, judges, and juries will have a momentary spasm of vigorous activity; and then, if the Nation continues to run true to form, all will settle back as before, and America will continue to be what it is to-day—the most crime-ridden country on the face of the earth.

You, Colonel Lindbergh, and you alone, can prevent this. You can marshal the good will, the honesty, the sincerity, and even the emotionalism of the American people into a fighting force for their own preservation. You can destroy the tolerance of crime, the power of crime, the reign of crime in the United States.

If this war is waged, it must be fought on many fronts. It involves a new ideal in the profession of law, the breaking down of medievalism in the law itself, which has made the processes of justice a barricade for crime to fight behind. Go to Judge Samuel Seabury and ask him how the law protects and fosters crime in America. He is one of the few American lawyers not afraid to tell the story of Jeremy Bentham, who destroyed the medievalism of the law in England.

It involves the driving out of the underworld lawyer, who devotes himself to the protection of criminals by criminal methods, who lives on the profits of crime, yet is accepted in good standing by every court in America.

It involves the destruction of the alliance between crime and politics, by arousing the people to a deadly intolerance of weakness or corruption in public life.

It involves an attack on the sources of crime in the environment of children. Few men are by nature hard and merciless. Long years of training are necessary to brutalize men to the commission of such a deed as that involving your home. A thousand years ago, the Danish warriors who invaded England were trained for their work by tossing children in the air and catching them on spear points. In our city slums, in our juvenile gangs, we train unformed minds into a perverted, degraded, cold and passionless disregard of human feeling, and then, by our politics and our law, let the product of that perversion rule our lives.

It would be chimerical, and cruel, and foreign to your nature, to expect you to dramatize your own sufferings in a "drive against crime." But even as you charted the way across the Atlantic, you can chart the way to a new order in America, by quietly, persistently organizing the forces latent in this country, and letting that work stand as an enduring monument to your son.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of no quorum.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman withhold that a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. I withhold it.

H. R. 4668, AMENDING SECTION 3 OF THE FLOOD CONTROL ACT OF 1928

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the flood control bill that was under consideration yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration amends the first paragraph of section 3 of the flood control act of May 15, 1928.

Section 1 of this act adopts the project for flood control of the Mississippi River in its alluvial valley and for its improvement for navigation from Cape Girardeau, Mo., to the Head of Passes, and as outlined and set forth in House Document No. 90, Seventieth Congress, second session, and to be prosecuted under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers.

The main feature of this plan for flood control is a continuation in a more comprehensive and extensive way of the plan that had been approved by the flood control act of 1917 and of 1923, which provided for levee construction and bank revetment on the main channel of the river and on the tributaries, insofar as they were affected by the flood waters of the Mississippi River. In addition to this the adopted project provides for diversions and flood ways, but these are not involved in the present amendment.

Section 2 makes authorization for the appropriation required in the execution of the project and reads in part as follows:

As a full compliance with the principle (of local contribution) in view of the great expenditure estimated at approximately $292,000,000, heretofore made by the local interests in the alluvial valley of the Mississippi River for protection against the floods of that river; in view of the extent of national concern in the control of these floods in the interest of national prosperity, the flow of interstate commerce, and the movement of the United States mails; and, in view of the gigantic scale of the project, involving flood waters of a volume and flowing from a drainage area largely outside the States most affected, and far exceeding those of any other river in the United States, no local contribution to the project herein adopted is required.

To this declaration for completion of the project without local contribution there are three exceptions in section 3 of the act: (a) The States and local interests shall maintain to the extent of supervision the flood-control works after completion; (b) accept land turned over to them under the provisions of section 4 of this act; (c) provide without cost to the United States all rights of way for levees and levee foundations on the main stem of the Mississippi River between Cape Girardeau, Mo., and the Head of the Passes.

It was the intention of Congress in the passage of the flood control act as declared in section 2 that the United States had undertaken the execution of this project at national expense and without local contribution, save as provided in the exceptions.

However, in the execution of the project, conditions have arisen making an amendment clarifying the situation absolutely necessary.

The amendment as first introduced eliminated entirely exception "c" of section 3, which would require the United States to bear all expenses, including the foundations for levees on the main stem of the river. When this amendment was submitted to the War Department the report of the Secretary of War in respect to levee foundations was as follows:

The proposed amendment eliminates the portion of the first paragraph of section 3 of an act for the control of floods on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and for other purposes, published in Document 391, Seventieth Congress, by the omission of "(c) levee foundations and levees on the main stem of the Mississippi River between Cape Girardeau, Mo., and the Head of the Passes."

The procurement of rights of way is a task that can be performed much more quickly and cheaply by local authorities than by the United States, and therefore the imposing of the responsibility of securing these rights of way on local authority is a wise provision of law that should not be abandoned.

The Committee on Flood Control has retained this provision that the local interests should provide the rights of way and foundations for the levees.

Prior to the passage of the flood control act rights of way had already been provided and furnished for levee foundations, and levees had been constructed upon such rights of way upon practically the entire stretch of the Mississippi River involved in the project. But the relocations, changes, and extensions in the levee lines since the adoption has placed upon the local interests a burden which has taxed their resources to the limit, and while in the execution of this great project we may still feel that this burden is somewhat unreasonable, that provision of the law has been retained.

Also, in respect to the lands and property subjected to the flood waters of the Mississippi River on the main channel by reason of setbacks, changes, or extensions of the levee lines, the report says:

There is more of a question in this proposed amendment than the mere rights of way for levees. In the setback of a levee the question of abandoning considerable amounts of the best land in the valley will arise. The question is, Who shall pay for the land abandoned, if it should be paid for at all? At present the burden falls on those whose business it is to procure the right of way, namely, the local people; and they should, in my opinion, be required to bear at least a part of such burden. The proposed amendment does not cover this feature as it should.

As to this feature of the report relative to the lands and property abandoned by setbacks and changes in the levee lines, which is admitted to be some of the best lands in the valley, we feel that the construction placed upon the act to the effect that the "burden falls upon the local people" is not in accord with the intentions of Congress in the passage of the act. Besides, it places upon the local people a burden which under no conditions can be met, so the amendment was in that respect written to read as follows:

SEC. 3. In the execution of the adopted project, the United States shall provide flowage rights over all lands, including compensation for damages to improvements thereon at the time of the taking, which are not now between the existing levees and the low-water channel of the Mississippi River and which will be between the levee lines of the adopted project and the low-water channel of the Mississippi River by reason of setbacks, extensions, or other changes in the levee lines on the main stem of the Mississippi River between Cape Girardeau, Mo., and the Head of the Passes. The States or levee districts may provide for the United States, upon its request and at its expense such flowage rights, and the United States shall reimburse the States or levee districts in full for all payments made and expenses incurred in providing such flowage rights upon proof that they have been obtained at fair valuation and at reasonable expense.

It was suggested that the local interests could acquire the lands or the use thereof more quickly and cheaply than the United States, so the provision is made that the local authorities shall, upon the request of the United States, acquire the rights of way or flowage rights, to be reimbursed upon proof that they had been obtained at fair valuation and at reasonable expense. So under this provision there could be no unfair burden placed upon the Federal Government, because its authorities would compensate only upon reaching the conclusion that the valuation had been fair and the expenses reasonable.

We have not changed or transferred the burdens imposed by the act upon the local interests, although the changes and relocations of levee lines requiring new rights of way has greatly increased that burden.

The amendment also voids any conclusion that any unfair or unreasonable charge can be placed upon the Federal Government. We simply seek to make definite and clear that the purposes and intentions of the Congress in the passage of the act shall be carried out and complied with.

All admit that according to the adopted project the Government has undertaken the control of the flood waters on the main channel of the Mississippi River without local contribution except as therein set forth.

The lands placed between the newly located levees and the main-river channel are to be used by the United States for the purpose of the passage and control of its flood waters. The owners of such property are forced by the flood control act to surrender the same to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government for that purpose, and, as stated by the Secretary of War, "this comprises some of the best land in the valley." The lands in most instances are highly improved and comprise the homes and lifetime investments of American citizens.

The charges that the enactment of the proposed bill would place additional burdens upon the Federal Government not contemplated by the flood control act are unreasonable and unfounded. By virtue of the setbacks and changes in the levee lines on the main stem of the Mississippi River instead of raising, strengthening, and maintaining levee lines existing when the act was passed, there will be a saving in expenditures of sums in excess of what would be necessary to compensate for lands exposed as a result of such changes. I simply cite a few striking examples of this in the State of Louisiana:

ESTIMATES BY THE CHIEF STATE ENGINEER FOR LOUISIANA ON LANDS EXPOSED BY REASON OF SETBACKS AND CHANGES IN LEVEE LINES

United States Wilson Point new levee: Length, 19,289 feet (3.7 miles); cubic yards, 1,733,120; estimated cost, $423,633. Was adapted instead of raising and enlarging line around point: Length, 79,560 feet (15.1 miles); cubic yards, 6,649,315; estimated cost, $1,329,863. Saving to Government, $906,230.

There were 9,628 acres with improvements thereon thrown out here with an assessed valuation of $288,840,000.

In addition to saving $906,230 in actual cost of construction the new levee is on high ground and permanent location and therefore avoids the cost of maintaining by bank revetments or replacements in event of caving. The amount saved would, in this particular instance, be several times the sum necessary to compensate the landowners whose lands for all intents and purposes is made a portion of the channel of the Mississippi River. The same is true in the following instances:

United States Homestead new levee; United States Port Allen new levee; United States Port Allen Brusley new levee and enlargement: Length, 38,899 feet (7.36 miles); cubic yards, 2,469,321; estimated cost, $263,909.63. Was adopted instead of enlarging and raising old levee, length, 39,530 feet (7.48 miles); estimated cubic yards, 2,770,000; estimated cost, $498,600. Saving to Government, $234,690.37.

There were 102 acres with improvements thereon thrown out here.

United States Australia Point new levee: Length, 7,533 feet (1.4 miles); cubic yards, 900,000; estimated cost, $115,200, was adopted instead of raising and enlarging levee around point—length, 50,688 feet (9.6 miles); estimated cubic yards, 4,188,600; estimated cost, $628,290. Saving to Government, $513,090.

There were 3,350 acres with improvements thereon thrown out here with assessed valuation of $127,231.

This work is being done in the execution of a national project and under the provisions of the law adopted by the Congress with the direct provision that there should be no local contribution, except the States and local interests should furnish the foundations for the levees. This proposed amendment is simply asking that the law passed by the Congress be executed as intended, and it does not call for any additional authorization or appropriation and places no additional obligations on the Government that were not contemplated in the passage of the flood control act of 1928.

The setbacks, changes, and extensions in the levee lines in the execution of the project have placed upon the local interests costs for rights of way far in excess of what was contemplated when the flood control act was passed. Instead of transferring any additional burdens to the United States, the cost to local interests has been greatly enlarged. The cost for rights of way and levee foundations in the State of Louisiana was estimated by General Jadwin, Chief of Engineers, in the adopted project to be $867,000. As a result of the changes and extensions in the levee lines the amount actually spent in Louisiana has been $2,167,000, and as a result of new locations and changes a further prospective expenditure of $1,500,000 will be necessary. This would be $2,800,000 in excess of the original estimate.

The question has been raised as to the amount of lands involved. A fair estimate of the acreage that will be placed between the newly located levee lines and the main channel of the Mississippi River and used for the purpose of carrying these flood waters in the State of Louisiana is 37,000 acres, about 60 per cent of which is highly improved. If fair compensation is paid to the owners of this land taken and used for the purpose of the United States in the execution of this project, the cost to the Federal Government in final completion will be less by several million dollars than if the levees had been rebuilt and enlarged on the foundations existing when the act was passed.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. EVANS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the soldiers' bonus.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS of California. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to vote against the payment of the balance of the soldiers' bonus at this time. There are several reasons which compel me to take this attitude, and I shall endeavor to enumerate some of the most vital ones.

In order that a full understanding may be had of this proposed legislation it is necessary that we examine the law and ascertain what the Government undertook to pay the veterans in the way of extra compensation or bonus.

SEC. 201. The amount of adjusted-service credit shall be computed by allowing the following sums for each day of active service, in excess of 60 days, in the military or naval forces of the United States after April 5, 1917, and before July 1, 1919, as shown by the service or other record of the veteran: $1.25 for each day of oversea service and $1 for each day of home service, but the amount of the credit of a veteran who performed no oversea service shall not exceed $500, and the amount of the credit of a veteran who performed any oversea service shall not exceed $625.

It will be observed from the foregoing section that a veteran for home service was to receive $1 per day and for oversea service the sum of $1.25 per day, provided that in no event a veteran should receive more than $500 for home service and $625 for home and oversea service.

This was what the Government offered and the veteran accepted.

When on May 19, 1924, the foregoing section was enacted by Congress there was not sufficient money available with which to make cash payment, so the Government tendered the veterans a compensation—or insurance—certificate which was made up as follows: To the total amount due each veteran for both home and foreign service was first added a further bonus of 25 per cent of that amount; for example, the veteran whose certificate for home service amounted to $500 was to receive an additional $125, or a total of $625, and the veteran whose certificate for home and foreign service combined amounted to $625 was to receive an additional sum of $156.25, or a total of $781.25.

To this increased amount was added interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum for 20 years, which actually more than doubled the amount of the veteran's enlarged claim, and he was then given a compensation or insurance certificate for the total, amounting to approximately $1,600 for overseas veterans. The same proportion of increase applied to every veteran according to the length of his service and the amount of his certificate, so the face value of the certificates issued the veterans in 1924, payable in 1945, was approximately two and one-half times the amount they were promised by the Government.

At the last session of Congress a strong drive was made by certain organized groups of veterans for payment of the full face value of these bonus certificates. The Congress felt, however, that in view of the fact that these claims had been increased two and one-half fold and would not be due until 1945, it would be unfair to the Government to undertake to pay the full face value, and in order to meet the pressing condition of veterans who were in need of help authorized a loan of 50 per cent of the face value of the bonus certificates. Allowing for the interest that had accrued on these certificates from the time of their issuance to February 27, 1931—the date on which the loan was authorized—each veteran who availed himself of the privilege of the loan received within $3 to $5 of the amount that he was promised by the Government. He has had the benefit of this insurance, which is in the nature of a life policy and which would have cost him about $15, based on the American Table of Mortality Rates.

Obviously there is no justification for immediate payment which, as above indicated, means payment of approximately double the amount due in the first instance.

I voted for the act passed by Congress on February 27, 1931, creating the loan of 50 per cent of the face value of the certificates, and to override the President's veto of the measure. Except in one instance recently, I have voted for all legislation for the benefit of veterans and their dependents since my service in Congress, and the only three votes I have ever cast to override the President's veto were for legislation for aid to veterans. I mention this to indicate my attitude as that of being friendly and endeavoring to be fair toward veterans of all wars.

Even if the veterans' compensation certificates were due at this time, I could not support the proposed plan of setting the Government printing presses to the task of printing sufficient money to pay them without any security available behind it except thin air. It would take $2,423,000,000 to pay the balance of the face value of the certificates if paid now. I have shown that they have received approximately this amount already as a loan on their certificates, and if they never received any further payment they would not be losers. The flooding of the country with unprotected currency of this kind would in all probability, according to the best financial minds of both political parties, take us off the gold basis and precipitate the country into a financial crisis which would prove disastrous.

I recognize the fact that many veterans are in great need of aid at this time. The same condition applies, however, in equal force to the remaining 120,000,000 citizens who are faced with the burdens of our present financial and economic crisis. If the veteran is disabled by his war service, he is receiving compensation and ample medical attention. If his disabilities have no service connection whatever, he still receives a pension and ample medical attention if his income is less than that exempted under the income tax law. This obligation to the disabled this country must under no condition neglect, and in order to properly meet its obligation to disabled veterans the country can not afford to divert unwarrantedly funds which must ever be held intact for them.

The controlling feature, however, of this proposed legislation is, in my mind, the fact that every soldier has secured or can secure to-day, if he so desires, his $1 a day for every day served in this country and his $1.25 a day for every day he served on the other side. It would be eminently unfair and unjust to the tax-paying public, of which the veteran is a part, to double his payment and undertake to pay him money in a form that would threaten the integrity of our whole financial structure.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I now renew my request to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida renews his request to extend his remarks in the RECORD, as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, it is very evident we shall not be able to get a quorum to-day. I shall endeavor to arrange that some night next week we shall call the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. May the Chair state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] that a number of Members have requested the Chair to ask the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from New York to confer with a view to arranging for a day or a night session to consider bills on the Private Calendar under the old practice. If it is possible, it seems to the Chair some arrangement should be made whereby the Private Calendar could be called, and in cases where there were no objections the bills could be considered and passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, carrying out the proposal of the Chair, would it be agreeable to the gentleman from Illinois that next Friday night from 8 o'clock to 10.30 o'clock we consider bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to at the point we left off when the calendar was last considered?

Mr. BLANTON. Let us wait until Monday to agree on that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I may say it is entirely agreeable to me to have a meeting either Thursday or Friday night of next week.

Mr. BLANTON. Let us wait until next week to decide about that.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SEIBERLING] be given a leave of absence of 10 days beginning yesterday on account of injuries suffered in an automobile accident.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, May 23, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

586. Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report dated May 20, 1932, from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination and survey of Indian Harbor and Canal, Ind., was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SMITH of Idaho: Committee on the Public Lands. H. R. 6484. A bill to grant lands in Alaska to the Yakutat & Southern Railway, a Washington corporation authorized to carry on its business in the Territory of Alaska; with amendment (Rept. No. 1399). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

7876. By Mr. WATSON: Resolution passed by the City Council of Philadelphia, relative to the creation of a Delaware River joint commission; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE

MONDAY, MAY 23, 1932

(Legislative day of Monday, May 9, 1932)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

THE LINDBERGH TRAGEDY—SERMON BY DOCTOR M'CARTNEY

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a sermon delivered in the Covenant-First Presbyterian Church, of Washington, D. C., by Rev. Albert Joseph McCartney, based on the Lindbergh tragedy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The sermon is as follows:

"A LITTLE CHILD SHALL LEAD THEM"

(Scriptual Lesson—Judges xx, 1-18)

(Text—Judges xix, 30—"And it was so, that all that saw it said, there was no such deed done nor seen from the day that the children of Israel came up out of the land of Egypt unto this day; consider of it, take advice, and speak your minds."

Judges xx, 3—"Tell us, how was this wickedness?"

Isaiah xi, 6—"A little child shall lead them."

The disclosures of Thursday night swept aside our chosen theme, for right of way should be given in every pulpit in the land to the one subject that is absorbing the mind and heart of the world. On a February afternoon in 1909 I chanced to be in Newcastle, Pa., where I snatched an extra from a newsboy announcing the kidnaping of one of my Sunday school boys, Billy Whitla, the 8-year-old son of a prominent family in Sharon, near by. The search led to all quarters of the country. I witnessed in a most intimate way the anguish of that father and mother with whom I spent that first night. No tongue can tell, no pen can possibly describe the emotions of such a household. Six days later in my church study we wrapped up the ransom money, carrying out in every detail the instructions of the kidnapers, and Mr. Whitla boarded the train for Cleveland where his boy was returned that night.

A wave of joy swept the whole country which next morning came to a focus in Sharon as the lad was returned amid tumultuous rejoicing of thousands that thronged the main street of that city and surged up and around the residence of the father. There standing on the porch, the united family was greeted with great acclaim as that vast multitude broke into the familiar music of the Doxology.

We had hoped that some such scene would sooner or later stage the denouncement of this recent crime, but instead the whole Nation is broken in grief and shame and in place of the Doxology we must join in the dirge of David, when after the battle in the woods, he received the intelligence of his son's death, and climbed the stairs to his chamber over the wall, sobbing at every step: "O Absalom, my son, my son. Would God I had died for thee. O Absalom, my son! My son."

If this crime can not kindle such a flame of righteous indignation that shall help to purge this Nation of its lawlessness, then God pity America, for she is lost, utterly lost, and it is but a question of time till our boasted land of freedom shall find her common destiny and be one with Nineveh and Tyre.

In the closing chapter of the Book of Judges there is a revolting tale of a horrible crime committed against the virtue of a young Jewish girl by the criminal element in the city of Gibeah, belonging to the tribe of Benjamin, a somewhat indelicate tale which may be delicately told to our profit, against the background of what has happened at Hopewell. She and her betrothed husband had stopped for the night in this town where they were strangers and were preparing to camp out in the street when an old man had compassion upon them and extended them hospitality for the night. There an attack was made by a lawless element in the town, and after a night of bestiality, the poor creature was discarded on the doorstep of the old man's house where her lord found her dead "at the door of the house with her hand upon the threshold." He placed the corpse upon an ass and wended his way homeward across the mountains of Ephraim. Upon arrival there he did a dramatic thing. He severed the body into 12 pieces and sent a section thereof to the chiefs of the 12 tribes of Israel, with a detailed account of the crime that had been committed.

The moral reaction upon Israel was instantaneous. Men came from all over Palestine to the capital of the tribes at Mizpah, in religious frenzy to voice their indignation—400,000 of them armed to the teeth. Then they put this Levite upon the witness stand and he rehearsed in their hearing the horrible details and finished up with an appeal for justice to the government of the tribes. Then the people rose as one man, saying: "We will not any of us go to his tent, neither will any of us return to his house," and on the wave of a great indignation they hurled themselves repeatedly against the embattled Benjaminites who had refused to deliver up the criminals, till at the price of nearly 100,000 lives they practically wiped out the tribe of Benjamin.

The parallel that is moving in all our minds as I rehearse this tale of antiquity is obvious and has something to say to us here in America across all these centuries. It took a fearful and horrible crime against an innocent girl to arouse the people of Israel to the moral conditions in the tribe of Benjamin and to awaken them to such a sense of righteous indignation as to purge the land of that iniquity. "God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform." This crime that has so shocked the heart of the world is in no way a part of God's purposes, but God is capable of making even the wrath of men to praise Him, and I do believe that in the inscrutable providence of Almighty God this dastardly deed may serve to bring America to her senses and arouse the people of the land as one man in a determination to clean the Stygian stalls of our great cities and sever the alliance between the underworld and crooked politics, whose representatives are thugs and murderers, child stealers and extortionists, and root out the poison nests of crime that infest this land.

It takes some such tragedy to shock the world into its senses. It took the sacrifice of a young girl in that unspeakable crime yonder in the hills of Ephraim to galvanize the sluggish heart of Israel into moral action. It took the death of Edith Cavell to unite the Allies of the world in a deathless purpose. It took the death of the Son of God in the tragedy of the crucifixion to turn the moral tide for righteousness in the ancient world, and if the heart of this country, standing by the pitiful remains of yonder little child in Hopewell, can only be galvanized into a vast determination to change the whole face of human society, to have millions make a vow to God as one man to come away from our worship of false gods and our alliance with lust and adultery and greed and our casual attitude toward lawlessness, then some blessing may be distilled from this cup of woe. Unless we react to this crime after some such manner, then woe to our country, for there is nothing left but surrender to crime and lust and intemperance and anarchism, and the proud name of Columbia shall be brought low in the dust, and it will only be a question of time her destiny, I say, shall be one with Nineveh and Tyre. But, oh, that this foul and unspeakable murder might arouse anew the spirit of the real America, the spirit that made America, the spirit that was America!

Our first and natural reaction to these horrible disclosures is to unleash the bloodhounds of the law in every land and let the whole world be turned into a vast detective bureau and take the perpetrators of this crime and hang them high as Haman. If they may soon be overtaken by the law and such punishment meted out, then fortunate will they be, for to carry the burning burden of this crime a secret to the end of their days would seem to be a punishment which the human heart would be incapable of enduring.

But, my friends, what concerns us is not so much the manner and the meed of the punishment of this crime, but the future prevention of such crimes, and to do this we shall have to work toward the eradication of the motive. No degree of punishment, however severe, will suffice to turn the purposes of such criminals. We must change the whole atmosphere in regard to these things. We must do something more to organize society on a basis and inspire it with a soul where these things can not flourish.

1. Let us begin with the children. The trouble with us is that we have reared up a generation of young men and young women who have no real sense of God and, therefore, no sense of responsibility to society. The training of children in the ethics of life and religion has either been wholly neglected in the home or they have been turned over to the innocuous training of our third-rate Sunday schools by parents who are bankrupt of their own faith and long since have shifted all responsibility for the well-being of their children whom they have brought into the world. We scoff at Russia and her hordes of wandering children who have to forage like wild beasts for themselves, but that is not a bit worse than the lamentable conditions in large sections of respectable America where the children are left to shift for themselves so far as moral and spiritual feeding is concerned. Too many of our so-called first citizens have been sacrificing at the altar of Sunday morning recreation, which leaves no place for the encouragement of our children by an example in the matter of religious training, at the only time in the calendar in the whole week when such a thing can be made possible. Don't try to tell me that your children are just as fine and responsible to society as those brought up with religious care. The amazing thing is that so many of them are, but, my friends, they are living on the accumulated capital of their godly grandparents and great grandparents. But the blood is running thin, and that patrimony will not last forever, and you can't keep the social order on a high and sensible tone without God. Sooner or later it is bound to break down.

Let our answer, therefore, to this crime against childhood be, then, a rededication of American parenthood to the biggest business of all, the Christian training of our children. Shall we continue to bring them up with a casual attitude to adultery in the home and disregard for law through our own example and the worship of money as king in the household and the way of pleasure as the one to be constantly chosen? Let us rather build up in the minds of our children a sense of their responsibilities to society through a knowledge of their accountability to Almighty God. Therefore, I lift up my voice as with a trumpet and call to you parents, come back from the godless lives, come back from your careless conduct in the presence of your children, come back from your divorce courts and your creed of pleasure as the chief end of man and give some attention to the religious welfare of your households. On the battlefield of Gettysburg there is a stone whereon is chiseled this inscription: "The high watermark of the Rebellion." From that bloody angle the tide turned toward ultimate victory for the North. Let us make that little grave in Hopewell a national shrine that marks the high watermark of moral and spiritual rebellion in our Christian homes and turn our faces as one man to new resolve: "And a little child shall lead them."

2. Another answer to this crime can be a regard for the majesty of the law, so far as we ourselves are concerned. It is our lawlessness that creates the moral atmosphere in which these crimes that so outrage society to-day thrive and prosper. Lawlessness has reached the proportions of a national calamity. Statisticians have estimated our annual loss through crime and racketeering in billions of dollars. Perhaps our Nation can stand the loss of these vast amounts from the channels of legitimate industry, but we can not survive the loss of human character that is inferred. Every now and then we are furnished with revolting crimes which shock us into fresh consciousness of the moral pitfalls that are around about our very homes, and we hold up our hands and wring them in holy horror at the revelations. Yet every time you get your boy out of trouble for speeding on the public highway, every time you bribe an officer of the law for your personal convenience, you make it easier for some one else to buy off the law and harder for the officer to do his duty. If you break the law with impunity, then your boy can break the law; and if your boy can break the law, then any other boy can break the law with impunity. I know it is the most popular pastime amongst us to dump all this lawlessness on the doorsill of prohibition, but I tell you where the trouble lies—in the homes of you, fathers and mothers, who haven't the moral backbone nor the patriotic ardor nor the Christian conscience to set your growing boys and girls a decent example.

Every time you patronize a bootlegger you contribute to the moral atmosphere that makes these fearful crimes possible and you are participating hand in glove with Al Capone and all his lecherous crew. You become a stockholder in the amalgamated crime of America. In his inaugural address three years ago President Hoover said: "It is as much the duty of the citizen to obey the law as it is the duty of the officer to enforce it." When liberty reaches such a pitch as to permit a crime of violence to wound the holiest and most venerable rights of life, it changes its name and becomes barbarism. O, my countrymen, let this crime kindle such a flame of indignation in all our hearts that under its illumination we may see clearly what a part we each have to share in this whole spirit of lawlessness that is blighting this land. In the name of patriotism, in the name of Christ, let us rise up like men and women and face the claims of law obedience ourselves and reassert our faith in the majesty of the law as the pillar and the crown of our Republic.

Another reaction to this crime is the utter futility of legislation, education, or police discipline to accomplish the ends desired in and of themselves. Only a change of heart in our country can bring this to pass.

What this country needs is a great revival of genuine religion. God seems to be shaking mightily the earth, reminding us in every way that a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth. He is saying to America in unmistakable language: "Let not the rich man glory in his riches, neither let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, let not the mighty man glory in his might, but let him that gloryeth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth Me." A personal experience of God is the only cure

The country is being surfeited with analysts and counselors for our national well-being. We listen to our fifth-rate radio economists and political fence menders, and the name of their panaceas is legion. Down underneath it all the explanation is plain—we have reared a generation that has lost its faith in God. A third of the people in America have frankly no religion at all for the census taker to record. Synagogues have been converted into social clubs and the Catholic and Protestant churches have suffered sufficient losses in the last 15 years to turn the scale in America from morality to immorality, from the time-honored respectabilities of our fathers to pleasure, booze, and divorce. What America needs is a mighty revival of religion. The heart cry of humanity is for God. In view of all this never did the church of Jesus Christ have such an open door of opportunity.

Where shall this revival begin? Where else than in your life and in mine? "It's not my brother, it's not my mother, it's not my sister, it's not my father—it's me, O Lord, standin' in the need of prayer." If your heart is hot with indignation over this tragedy in Hopewell, and if your hands reach out to take hold upon something that you can do to change things, there is one practical thing you can do; you can change your attitude to God. You can find out what are the barriers that seem to shut God out of your life, and if each one of us here should succeed under this vow to take those barriers down in his own life, what an eloquent answer that would be, how it might turn the whole tide for righteousness throughout the land. "It's not my brother, it's not my mother, it's not my sister, it's not my father—it's me, O, Lord! standin' in the need of prayer." "And a little child shall lead them."

WAR POLICIES COMMISSION

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, on May 6 the national executive committee of the American Legion met in Indianapolis, Ind., and unanimously adopted a resolution relating to the War Policies Commission, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas the American Legion has, since its convention in 1922, advocated legislation to give the President power, in case of any emergency declared by Congress, to mobilize all the material resources, industrial organizations, and services, for the purpose of carrying on war, including power to stabilize prices, not only for those commodities required by the Government but for the whole civilian population; and

Whereas it is our opinion that if all necessary stabilizing machinery can be made operative immediately upon the imminence of any emergency a long and important step forward will have been made in organizing the national defense in an orderly, equitable, and economical manner, and will, if properly administered, take the profit out of war and preclude in any future crisis many, if not all, of the economic ills, dissatisfaction, and unrest that have been the aftermath of the World War; and

Whereas on June 27, 1930, Congress enacted Public Resolution No. 98, creating the War Policies Commission, charged with the responsibility of studying this entire matter for the purpose of submitting a report to the President, who, in turn, was to submit it to the Congress; and

Whereas this commission, after extensive hearings, has made such a report, which report, findings, and recommendations are now before the United States Senate: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the national executive committee of the American Legion hereby extends to the War Policies Commission its sincere congratulations for the thorough and exhaustive manner in which they went into this entire matter and for the splendid work they have done, and calls upon the Senate of the United States to speedily enact into law the legislative recommendations of the commission and thereby put into effect the program constantly advocated by the American Legion during the past 10 years, not only as a peace measure but as a sound national-defense policy.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the approval of the Journal of May 19, 20, and 21 last.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

CANADIAN OPINION ON UNITED STATES PROBLEMS

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a portion of the editorial from the Vancouver Sun of May 9, reproduced in the Atlanta Georgian of May 20, 1932, dealing with the problems of the United States and expressing a Canadian viewpoint.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

What is the objective economy of the United States? The accumulation of gold and the piling up of more and higher interest-bearing securities? Or an economy that will distribute goods, increase work and wages and buying power throughout the continent?

The President denies the use of the national prerogative to create business, by bonuses to soldiers, by the prosecution of public works, and by cooperative group planning for farmers, through the issuing of national currency for which the country has ample wealth. His cry of balancing budgets by reduced expenditures and increased taxation can result only in destruction of industry and the confiscation of the taxpayer's wealth.

Has it never dawned on the American President that after reasonable economies are effected the only way a budget can be balanced is by bringing the purchasing volume up to a nation's power to create, to produce, and consume?

Has this been done?

Rather than even attempt such a thing, the President of this great neighbor Republic seems determined to let depression do its worst and to let his people go jobless and hungry.

Every day the value of what Americans do and what Americans own is falling. Canadians, although sympathetically affected by actions of Washington, are just as helpless to suggest or interfere in the economy of the United States as they are to interfere with the religious but devastating economy of India.

The notion so often advanced that North America is simply passing through one more natural period of depression and panic, from which we shall recover, is wholly wrong.

The basic causes of this depression have world-wide roots which are exaggerated in industrialized North America. That cause is the multiplication of the power of people to produce without accompanying increases in their capacity to consume.

The defective, outlived attitude toward gold and money and the handling of credit has made it impossible for man to buy the goods he can now produce. And, confronted with a situation like this, the Hoover mind seems inert and helpless.

One hundred and twenty million Americans stand before a flood of food and machinery and science without a monetary medium to acquire for themselves and their families that portion that will give them food and work and hope.

Eight millions of those Americans are out of jobs and are, therefore, economically outlawed, with no hope of relief.

Yet, in the face of this appalling picture, the Hoover message to his Congress calls for nothing but further reductions in wages and consumption and an increase in sacrifice.

Under the deadening weight of the Hoover inaction America's masses seem slowly but surely heading to the condition of China and India.

From the Canadian side of North America the President's message sounds like the doom of a great nation or the doom of a great political party.

ADDRESS BY FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an address by Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt, delivered in Atlanta, Ga., on May 22, from which I want to read one paragraph:

We may build more factories, but the fact remains that we have enough now to supply all our domestic needs and more, if they are used. No; our basic trouble was an insufficiency of capital, it was an insufficient distribution of buying power coupled with an oversufficient speculation in production.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune, May 23, 1932]

RISE IN SCALE OF PAY ASKED BY ROOSEVELT—"FORGOTTEN MAN" WILL REVOLT UNLESS ASSURED A LIVELIHOOD AT CAPITAL'S EXPENSE, UNITED STATES WARNED—TRIAL AND ERROR METHOD ADVOCATED—EXPERIMENTS HELD VITAL; SPEECH IS KEYNOTE OF PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

By Ernest K. Lindley

ATLANTA, GA., May 22.—Speaking to-night at the commencement exercises of Oglethorpe University, Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt advocated social planning to achieve a "more equitable distribution of the national income" and asserted that the country needs and demands "bold, persistent experimentation."

The country, Mr. Roosevelt said, can not afford to have its economic life controlled by "that small group of men whose chief outlook upon the social welfare is tinctured by the fact that they can make huge profits from the lending of money and the borrowing of securities."

WARNS OF REVOLUTION PERIL

The governor issued what was construed as a direct warning to conservatives, and to certain Wall Street interests in particular, that only by drastic correction in the faults of the American economic system can open revolt be averted.

"The country needs, and unless I mistake its temper, the country demands, bold, persistent experimentation," he said. "It is common sense to take a method and try it; if it fails, admit it frankly and try another. But above all, try something. The millions who are in want will not stand by silently forever while the things to satisfy their needs are within easy reach."

Governor Roosevelt's address was regarded by those who follow his campaign for the presidential nomination as the fullest and most straightforward expression of his credo of political and economic liberalism that he has yet made. By them it is viewed as a marking out of the ground on which he will make his fight for the nomination in Chicago, if a fight is necessary, and upon which, if he is nominated, he will make his campaign against President Hoover.

It is understood to be the first of two speeches which the governor had prepared for use before the Chicago convention to cement his following and insure the incorporation of his views in the Democratic platform. The second speech is expected to deal more concretely with certain specific methods.

BLAMES DEPRESSION ON WASHINGTON

Although Mr. Roosevelt mentioned no names, his address was replete with criticisms of the Coolidge and Hoover administrations, as well as of the Wall Street banking group, which is classed as hostile to his nomination. Alluding to the speculative mania of 1928, he said that "to the stimulation of belief in this dazzling chimera was lent not only the voices of our men in high office but their influence and the material aid of the very instruments of government which they controlled."

The governor asserted that "we are all suffering to-day from the comfortable theory" that the economic depression will come to an end through the natural operation of economic law.

Persons familiar with the recent speeches of Alfred E. Smith saw in one passage of Mr. Roosevelt's address a direct answer to the point of view advanced by Mr. Smith in indorsing the sales tax. The governor said that if one injures capital one strikes at the workingman.

Mr. Roosevelt said that "many of those whose primary solicitude is confined to the welfare of what they call capital have failed to read the lessons of the last few years and have been moved less by calm analysis of the needs of the Nation as a whole than by a blind determination to preserve their own special stakes in the economic order."

While capital will continue to be needed, said the governor, it is probable "that our physical plant will not expand in the future at the same rate at which it has expanded in the past."

"We may build more factories," he said, "but the fact remains that we have enough now to supply all our domestic needs and more, if they are used. No; our basic trouble was not an insufficiency of capital; it was an insufficient distribution of buying power coupled with an oversufficient speculation in production.

"Do what we may have to do to inject life into our ailing economic order, we can not make it endure for long unless we can bring about a wiser, more equitable distribution of the national income. It is well within the inventive capacity of man, who has built up this great social and economic machine, capable of satisfying the wants of all, to insure that all who are willing and able to work receive from it at least the necessities of life. In such a system, the reward for a day's work will have to be greater, on the average, than it has been, and the reward to capital, especially capital which is speculative, will have to be less."

Assailing what he termed "the Wall Street group," Mr. Roosevelt said: "We can not allow our economic life to be controlled by that small group of men whose chief outlook upon the social welfare is tinctured by the fact they can make huge profits from the lending of money and the marketing of securities—an outlook which deserves the adjectives 'selfish' and 'opportunist.'"

The governor said that after "the experience of the last three years" the average person would rather receive "a smaller return upon his savings in return for greater security for the principal than experience for a moment the thrill of the prospect of being a millionaire, only to find the next moment that his fortune, actual or expected, has withered in his hand because the economic machine has again broken down."

Mr. Roosevelt told his audience that for the attainment of the objective which he defined there would be needed "the courage of the young" and "enthusiasm, imagination, and the ability to face facts, even unpleasant ones, bravely." His parting injunction to the members of the graduating class was: "Yours is not the task of making your way in the world, but the task of remaking the world which you will find before you."

RECALLS DELUSIONS OF GOLDEN ERA

In leading up to his main argument, Mr. Roosevelt said:

"The year 1928 does not seem far in the past; but since that time, as all of us are aware, the world about us has experienced significant changes. Four years ago, if you heard and believed the tidings of the time, you could expect to take your place in a society well supplied with material things and could look forward to the not too distant time when you would be living in your homes, each (if you believed the politicians) with a 2-car garage, and, without great effort, would be providing yourselves and your families with all the necessities and amenities of life and, perhaps in addition, assure by your savings their security and your own in the future.

"Indeed, if you were observant, you would have seen that many of your elders had discovered a still easier road to material success—had found that once they had accumulated a few dollars they needed only to put them in the proper place and then sit back and read in comfort the hieroglyphics called stock-market quotations which proclaimed that their wealth was mounting miraculously without any work or effort on their part.

TO-DAY'S PLIGHT CONTRASTED

"How sadly different is the picture which we see around us to-day. If only the mirage had vanished, we should not complain, for we should all be better off. But with it has vanished, not only the easy gains of speculation but much of the savings of thrifty and prudent men and women, put by for their old age and for the education of their children. With these savings has gone among millions of our fellow citizens, that sense of security to which they have rightly felt they are entitled in a land abundantly endowed with natural resources and with the productive facilities to convert them into the necessities of life for all our population. More calamitous still, there has vanished with the expectation of future security the certainty of to-day's bread and clothing and shelter."

After discussing briefly a lack of plan in our society which he said led us to educate, for example, more teachers than we could find positions for, he plunged into the economic field.

"In the same way we can not review carefully the history of our industrial advance without being struck with its haphazardness," he said, "with the gigantic waste with which it has been accomplished—with the superfluous duplication of productive facilities, the continual scrapping of still useful equipment, the tremendous mortality in industrial and commercial undertakings, the thousands of dead-end trails into which enterprise has been lured, the profligate waste of natural resources.

"Much of this waste is the inevitable by-product of progress in a society which values individual endeavor and which is susceptible to the changing tastes and customs of the people of which it is composed. But much of it, I believe, would have been prevented by greater foresight and by a larger measure of social planning. Such controlling and directive forces as have been developed in recent years reside to a dangerous degree in groups having special interests in our economic order, interests which do not coincide with the interests of the Nation as a whole.

"I believe that the recent course of our history has demonstrated that while we may utilize their expert knowledge of certain problems and the special facilities with which they are familiar, we can not allow our economic life to be controlled by that group of men whose chief outlook upon the social welfare is tinctured by the fact that they can make huge profits from the lending of money and the marketing of securities—an outlook which deserves the adjectives 'selfish' and 'opportunist.'

"You have been struck, I know, by the tragic irony of our economic situation to-day. We have not been brought to our present state by any natural calamity—by drought or floods or earthquakes—or by destruction of our productive machine or our man power. Indeed, we have a superabundance of raw materials, a more than ample supply of equipment for manufacturing these materials into the goods which we need, and transportation and commercial facilities for making them available to all who need them.

"But raw materials stand unused, factories stand idle, railroad traffic continues to dwindle, merchants sell less and less, while millions of able-bodied men and women, in dire need, are clamoring for the opportunity to work. This is the awful paradox with which we are confronted, a stinging rebuke that challenges our power to operate the economic machine which we have created."

CALLS FOR COURAGE AND INITIATIVE

Governor Roosevelt summarized briefly some of the "multitude of views" upon how the economic machine could be set up in motion again, and after defining his own conception of the goal which should be borne in mind, he said:

"Probably few will disagree that the goal is desirable. Yet many of faint heart, fearful of change, sitting tightly on the roof tops in the flood, will sternly resist striking out for it lest they fail to attain it. Even among those who are ready to attempt the journey there will be violent differences of opinion as to how it should be made. So complex, so widely distributed over our whole society are the problems which confront us that men and women of common aim do not agree upon the method of attacking them. Such disagreement leads to doing nothing, to drifting. Agreement may come too late.

"Let us not confuse purpose with method. Too many so-called leaders of the Nation fail to see the forest because of the trees. Too many of them fail to recognize the vital necessity of planning for definite objectives. True leadership calls for the setting forth of objectives and the rallying of public opinion in support of these objectives."

It was here that the speaker urged "bold, persistent experimentation."

The honorary degree of doctor of laws was awarded to the governor. The commencement exercises took place in the Fox Theater.

Governor Roosevelt later motored back to Warm Springs. He announced he would leave there on Wednesday morning and arrive in New York the next morning.

PROBLEMS OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in this morning's New York Herald Tribune there is a very interesting interview with Judge Morgan J. O'Brien, of New York City. He is in many respects our first citizen. I regard this as a notable expression of opinion of a wise man regarding present-day issues. It is entitled "What's the Matter with the United States?"

Mr. O'Brien emphasizes our greed, our falling off in religion, the spread of sensuality, a loosening of the standards of personal probity, manners and morals, and our failure to dispose of our surplus products and to make reasonable tariffs.

I ask that the interview may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The interview is as follows:

[From New York Herald Tribune, May 23, 1932]

WHAT'S THE MATTER WITH THE UNITED STATES?—MORGAN J. O'BRIEN HOLDS THE NATION IS ALL RIGHT, BUT THE PEOPLE HAVE MANY GROWING FAULTS

By Edward Angly

In 80 years of living Morgan J. O'Brien has learned not to worry, whatever happens. He isn't worrying to-day. His sun-tanned brow is unwrinkled. With a long span on the New York Supreme Court bench far behind, he is still active as the head of one of the city's largest law offices. He continues to relish golf, a game he pioneered in this country.

When his legs were sturdier and his muscles more supple, Judge O'Brien used to clip off 18 holes with a score somewhere in the eighties. In those days he would get as sore as the devil whenever he flubbed a brassie shot or topped an intended pitch to the pin. Nowadays it is seldom that he breaks a hundred, but even that doesn't worry him. He takes the bad shots with equanimity and puffs out his chest and grins when he gets off a good one.

PLAYERS THEMSELVES TO BLAME

On days when scarcely a shot seems to click sweetly from woods and irons, the judge isn't the sort of fellow to find fault with the course. So to-day, when the great game of life is being shot far below par by tens of millions of duffers, he sees no excuse for howling about the condition that the fairways are in. The players have only themselves to blame.

"No; there is nothing the matter with the United States," the judge remarks. "The trouble is and for some time has been with our people."

The trouble with our people, as observed by the judge's keen gray-blue eyes, is multifarious, and its vitiating varieties are increasing rather than diminishing.

Insatiable greed, a falling off in religion, a spread in sensuality, a loosening of the standards of personal probity, manners and morals, a growing preference for reckless living instead of simple, temperate living, a lack of poise, "a failure to mind whatsoever things are elevated"—these are a few of the flaws Judge O'Brien picks in watching America's millions as they play the game.

Economically, he says, we have failed in the distribution of our surplus products, in the making of tariffs and in our hesitancy to help settle the international problem of reparations and war debts. Politically we have erred in botching the Constitution with amendments which have encouraged majorities to run roughshod over minorities. Ethically, we have slipped away from many a sound old mooring.

SAYS BRIAND HAD RIGHT IDEA

Judge O'Brien is hopeful that the depression will chasten us. The abuses of prosperity, he believes, blunted the consciousness which is the basis of right living. He is optimistic enough to feel that the world is making progress toward some sort of moral unity consonant with the fact that scientific advancements have knit the separated peoples of this earth into a more closely woven fabric than our fathers knew. He thinks Aristide Briand was on the right track with his idea for a loose economic federation that would have left each people with their separate languages, customs, and culture.

Lounging on a fine old brocaded sofa in the drawing-room of his home, Judge O'Brien outlined his case against his countrymen. Like the good lawyer that he is, he cited authorities to hammer in his points. De Tocqueville, Bryce, Emerson, Matthew Arnold, Madison, Jefferson, Gladstone, and Macaulay—all these, and others, he called upon to fortify his arguments.

And Jim Hill, too. Most people may remember James J. Hill only as a great big rail and securities man, an empire builder, as the Victorians called the industrial leaders in America's age of expansion. But Judge O'Brien has other souvenirs. He remembers, for example, that Hill, more than 25 years ago, had this to say of his compatriots:

"We are a profligate nation, spendthrifts not only of our natural resources but of our physical and mental energies as well. We are money-reckless, work-reckless, ambition-reckless, play-reckless, social-reckless, according to our spheres and our callings. Literally, in the heat of the day, we take no thought for the morrow. It is not the sane life any more than it is the simple life."

The core of our present-day troubles, Judge O'Brien seems to feel, is to be found in the disintegration of the simple, natural, disciplined life which had its center in the home. In his boyhood, he recalls, decent people drummed two fundamental ideas into the consciences of their children; they must be honest and they must tell the truth. Few homes were without religious influence.

LAMENTS FOR HONOR AND TRUTH

"In the old days," he says, "business assumed that a young man who had been reared in a respectable home possessed the virtues of honesty and truthfulness. His domestic background was his guaranty when he went out into the workaday world to find a job. But to-day an office will not consider a man unless he brings with him not only a letter of introduction, but four or five recommendations setting forth in black and white that he is of good character.

"One does not have to search for long to find evidence of the fact that dishonesty has become more and more frequent in business relationships. Year by year statements of the surety companies show astounding increases in payments made on personal bonds because of defaults. Insatiable greed has spread far and wide the desire to get hold of another's property, to accumulate wealth by whatever means are the easiest and speediest. That is the code of the hold-up man on the dark street. It is the code of many a business man in his lighted office. Perhaps it is not easy to live rightly, but it is the only way to live if one is to look back happily on the years that have passed and face the future with content and without worry.

"To-day we are losing not only religion but order, poise, and the appreciation of simple, natural things. Greed for money, greed for amusements, people may think they are finding happiness that way, but really they do not find it.

"I can no longer understand the behavior of some of the young women who come from what are considered our better class of homes. You have seen what goes on in our speak-easies. I have never entered one of those institutions, but I know pretty well, I think, what they are like. The picture of a decent young woman going up to a bar and ordering a whisky sour is one that could not have been visualized in the old days.

BEWAILS "DECLINE OF RELIGION"

"So many of our children are reared to-day not only without religious influence but in a decidedly antireligious atmosphere. Men of position go about preaching that science is the negation of religion. It isn't at all. Men have ever looked about them, seen and appreciated the beauty of growing things—flowers, grass, trees, birds—and felt a respect for the One who created it all. Humanity has always recognized the existence of a Supreme Intelligence.

"I can not understand intolerance in religion itself or among those who look upon religion with the eyes of irreligion. Long before Christ the philosopher Confucius said: 'All religions are good, but some are better than others.' That is true, eternally true. It is a thought that leaves it to every man to be satisfied with his own religion. Every man should think his own the best. If I did not believe that the one in which I was brought up is the best, I would change to the one I did think was the best."

As the judge spoke Mrs. O'Brien walked through an adjoining room. They have been married happily for more than half a century and are the parents of nine children. So when Judge O'Brien speaks of the making of a home one feels it to be a subject on which he is quite qualified to speak.

"One of the things I have always endeavored to have my children cultivate," he says, "is poise. Often when we are together I speak of it. As a people we are inclined to rush about nervously at the simplest provocation. I used to say to my children, 'Now, if you hear a voice in the street crying, "Extra! Extra! Read abloop the bolp-blopp-blopp," and you rush to the elevator and the elevator doesn't happen to be at your floor at that very moment, don't get so excited that instead of waiting for it you must run all the way down the stairs. Keep your head, be calm, don't worry. Whatever has happened probably doesn't matter very much anyway.'"

WHAT OF THIS GROWING DISORDER?

With the general lack of poise Judge O'Brien also remarks an increasing disorder. In Manhattan, he says, a man who visits a friend's apartment for dinner never can be certain that he won't be held up on his way home. The judge recalls several recent stick-ups and temporary abductions which occurred in his own neighborhood—the East Sixties, which are supposed to enjoy a little more poise and quite as much good order as any other part of town. The judge remembers when that neighborhood not only was uptown but also all the way out into the country.

His opposition to prohibition is as whole-hearted as any man's, but he doesn't blame the growth of violence in this country entirely upon sumptuary legislation. He blames greed, too, and is not unmindful of the national exuberance which Jim Hill called recklessness.

"The Lord gave us a country blessed with wealth and resources such as no other country ever possessed," he says. "Our country contained coal, iron, copper, silver, gold, and other minerals, and in the fields we could produce everything needed for food and raiment, and these to an extent that we found there was more than we needed for our own people and that our surplus was available for export among other countries. Wherein we failed was in the distribution of our surplus. And we are to blame for tariff laws and barriers that have deterred the other countries from buying our surplus. Since we were the first to put up a high tariff I think we ought to be the first to take it down.

"A government was established by the fathers to secure 'life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.' These rights were embodied in a written Constitution. The fathers pledged 'their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor' in support of a 'government of the people, by the people, and for the people.' During the first hundred years these were secured and we enjoyed the benefits of what Gladstone, speaking of the Constitution, said was 'the greatest document that ever emanated from the brain and pen of man.' We had also in our personal, industrial, and commercial life unlimited opportunities to engage in any field of endeavor, and therefrom to secure for ourselves independence, peace, and happiness.

CITES CHANGES IN FAMILY LIFE

"In family life along simple lines we found peace and contentment. These latter have been impaired by luxury and fast living, resulting from the ill use of great wealth, so that the simple family life and the love for the home have been affected. In the wake of these changes came a disregard of the marriage tie and a loosening of the moral fiber of our people. These conditions brought about a disrespect for religion and were conducive to lax divorce laws.

"We departed from the lessons of the fathers by amendments antagonistic to the original structure of the Republic. To stem the tide of irreligion, immortality, and intemperance it was thought by many that prohibition was the panacea. And so, to experiment with it, we were willing to interfere with personal liberty and the sovereignty of our States. Whether it has failed in its purpose, whether it has brought in its wake crime and the greatest dangers to our growing generations, whether it has cost millions without resultant good, is one of the great issues that should be settled, definitely and finally, in the pending election if we are to have peace.

"Years ago Emerson, in speaking of the future of the Republic, said:

"'In this country, with our practical understanding, there is at present a great sensualism, a headlong devotion to trade, to trade and to the conquest of continent—to each man as large a share of the same as he can carve for himself—an extravagant confidence in our talent and activity, which becomes, whilst successful, a scornful materialism, but with the fault, of course, that it has no depth, no reserved force to fall back upon when a reverse comes.'

"Matthew Arnold, speaking with the authority of one of the world's great scholars and critics, in one of a series of American addresses said:

"'And the philosophers and the prophets, whom I at any rate am disposed to believe, and who say that moral causes govern the standing and the falling of the States, will tell us that the failure to mind whatsoever things are elevated must impair with an inexorable fatality the life of a nation, just as the failure to mind whatsoever things are just, will impair it; and that if the failure to mind whatsoever things are elevated should be real in your American democracy, and should grow into a disease and take firm hold on you, then the life of even these great United States must inevitably suffer and be impaired more and more, until it perish.'

FINDS WARNINGS WERE NOT HEEDED

"These warnings were permitted to go unheeded until the time when the world cataclysm as the aftermath of the war paralyzed the onward movement of trade and prosperity and our very civilization. It would have been well for us had we heeded the warnings against conditions which have engulfed not only our own country but the entire world in an industrial, economic, and social depression which now has lasted nearly three years. This has brought about financial and physical distress and has deprived the great body of our people of the chance of employment. Our financial system was endangered and we were naturally thrown into confusion.

"In an effort to stem the merciless tide which had set in and to find means to overcome distressing conditions it has taken, if we measure time by the intensity, a long time to find ourselves. The difficulty of the problems and the newness of the suggested remedies added for a while to our uncertainty and instability and destroyed in a large part the courage and the confidence of our people.

"However, while we may be critical of many suggestions which were made we must remember that nothing quite like the experience we are going through ever occurred in the history of the world. In the past we have had national panics and business depressions brought about by causes we could fathom. We successfully surmounted them. But this is a world affair and presents problems difficult and new to us.

"Slowly we are finding ourselves and returning to views and policies that are calculated to overcome this world deluge. Our President and Congress, breaking through partisan and political lines, are now whole-heartedly engaged in a direct and decisive way in the enactment of measures that should bring the needed relief. The strengthening of our fiscal and banking institutions was a great step forward, and now that we no longer are in doubt as to their ability to meet any strain that may be put upon them, we are prepared to go forward in restoring trade and commerce to normal conditions.

FEELS BUDGET MUST BE BALANCED

"There remain, however, other important steps to be taken which, with what has already been accomplished, should enable us to avoid the dangers which threatened our national life. As I view it, taking up the question of the needs of government, whatever may be the hardships and sacrifices to be made and however burdensome they may seem to appear, it is essential that we should balance our governmental Budget through taxes and economy.

"Another lesson which has been forced upon us is that we can no longer regard our problems as exclusively domestic. Instead of an American mind we must become world-minded. Let us forget we are Democrats or Republicans, but glory in the fact that we are Americans, loving our country with every fiber of our hearts. No people or nation can stand alone. The war, reduction of armaments, and our modern inventions and the trend and direction of population have brought peoples in clear touch with one another, and to a realization that it is the principle of cooperation between nations that alone can secure peace and world harmony.

"Our most serious international problem is that of the interallied debts. Our people entertain diverse views on the subject. This makes the problem of settling them difficult. Unless they are quickly disposed of they will keep the world disturbed and will unnecessarily delay the establishment of right relations between the nations. This question will be taken up at Lausanne in June, and unless then settled in some satisfactory manner it will continue to be a bone of contention and a source of delay in restoring normal conditions.

"Many have expressed themselves as if there were no interallied debts, contending that the moneys advanced were merely our contributions toward the expense of the war. There are others firmly of the opinion that they are just debts and should be paid. A third class insist that whether they are or not just debts is immaterial because they should be canceled. As Chancellor Bruening recently said, 'In the interest of the whole world the time has come for a decision.' If at Lausanne that subject is to be reopened and some new adjustments made on the basis of what would seem to be the amounts which the debtor nations are now able to pay, then if we are to avoid having the question of interallied debts remain a constant source of irritation and disturbance to the reconstruction of the debtor countries, it would appear to be but reasonable that we should accept the assurance of each of the debtor nations that they would pay 'when able.'

PAYMENT WAITS ON ABILITY

"We can not resort to force in order to obtain payments. In other words, we can never obtain the money due us unless the debtor nations are able to pay. Such a policy would allow time for the trade and commerce of the debtor nations to return to normal. Then there would unquestionably be a better chance to take up and dispose of the private and commercial debts, thus promoting trade and commerce among the various countries.

"With our international problems settled we can return with confidence to our domestic problems which are receiving the able and intelligent consideration of our President and Congress. With our banking system adjusted and strengthened, if we will speedily provide for a balanced Budget, if we will be sufficiently world-minded to come to an agreement with debtor nations, if we can dispose of prohibition so that its enforcement will no longer be a menace and a dangerous experiment, and if we will be more liberal with our tariff laws, there should be a favorable reaction in trade and business within a reasonable time. I have used the words 'within a reasonable time' because I feel that we must await the passing of the election period.

"Our national election always brings about a period of stagnation in business lasting several months before and after election. This brings up a question, often mooted, as to whether it would be advisable to extend the term of a President to six years and make him ineligible for reelection."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Dansville (N. Y.) Board of Trade, favoring the balancing of the Budget and drastic retrenchment in governmental expenditures, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Society of the Cincinnati, at Philadelphia, Pa., on May 5, 1932, opposing the passage of legislation granting additional compensation to veterans of the World War, and also curtailing personal liberties, and favoring the discontinuance of payments to veterans for nonservice disabilities, and the maintenance of the national defense, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the board of directors of Lafayette Club, No. 2, of Oakland, Calif., favoring the passage of legislation to permit the manufacture, sale, consumption, and distribution of beverages with increased alcoholic content, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH presented a memorial of sundry citizens, being barbers and beauty culturists, of Charleston, S. C., remonstrating against the imposition of a 10 per cent tax on toilet preparations in the pending revenue bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ASHURST presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from C. P. Stephens, secretary of the Arizona Automobile Dealers' Association, of Phoenix, Ariz., remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on the automobile industry, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Tucson, Ariz., remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on the automobile industry and favoring instead the adoption of some form of general tax in the pending revenue bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the Lawyers' Club, of Niagara Falls, N. Y., favoring the immediate repeal of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Local Union No. 94, Uniformed Firemen's Association of Greater New York, N. Y., favoring the issuance of $5,000,000,000 of bonds to finance construction of public works and other undertakings, so as to provide employment for idle men, which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Nassau County Camp, No. 115, United Spanish War Veterans, at Mineola, N. Y., remonstrating against cuts in appropriations for the Army which would result in retiring 2,000 Army officers and curtailment of Reserve Officers' Training Corps and citizens' military training camp activities, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Troy (N. Y.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring the immediate balancing of the Budget and retrenchment in governmental expenditures, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Syracuse (N. Y.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring the consolidation of duplicating Federal activities and bureaus, the adoption of the President's plan in the adjustment of the pay of Federal employees, and general retrenchment in governmental expenditures, and opposing further veterans' relief legislation except for disabled and incapacitated veterans, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens, being employees of the Schlegel Manufacturing Co., of Rochester, N. Y., praying for the balancing of the Budget and retrenchment in governmental expenditures, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens, being officers and employees of the Sheffield-Fischer Co., of Rochester, N. Y., praying for the balancing of the Budget and retrenchment in governmental expenditures, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on the automobile industry, and favoring instead some form of general sales tax, with exemptions, to be included in the pending revenue bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Brooklyn, N. Y., praying for protection for the rendering industry, especially the imposition of an import duty of 2 cents per pound on oils and one-half cent per pound on oil-cake meals and oil cakes, which was ordered to lie on the table.

GOVERNMENTAL FOREIGN SERVICES

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I have procured a typical compilation showing how seven different departments of the Government maintain separate and distinct foreign services in various foreign countries. The exhibit touches the four capitals at Copenhagen, Vienna, Mexico City, and Buenos Aires. These capitals were not chosen invidiously. They are presented merely as a typical cross section. The situation is more or less the same in every capital. I am not intending to be critical. I am simply submitting the challenge whether this is not another of the opportunities for economy through concentrations and combinations and coordinations and eliminations. I am speaking of net economy without loss of essential efficiency. I ask that this exhibit be referred to the Appropriations Committee for the use of its special economy subcommittee, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the exhibit was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNEMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have two copies of resolutions passed by a meeting of unemployed citizens of Auburn, King County, Wash. One of the resolutions urges the entrance by the Government upon the employment program, involving the expenditure of $4,000,000,000 or $5,000,000,000, and the other urges that a moratorium be declared with reference to mortgages on homes and other indebtedness. I ask that the resolutions may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The first resolution was referred to the Committee on Manufactures, as follows:

Whereas the United States of America is suffering from a nationwide commercial, industrial, financial, and economic depression, which has resulted in the closing of thousands of industrial and commercial institutions throughout the United States during the past three years, as the result of which millions of laborers have been thrown out of employment and deprived of a means of providing the necessities of life for themselves and families;

Whereas there are now in the United States of America approximately 45,000,000 people who are directly and indirectly affected by such unemployment on the part of heads of families and others having dependents, whose standards of living are greatly reduced or whose means of livelihood are entirely cut off as the result thereof;

Whereas thousands of banks, savings banks, loan associations, and other investment and financial institutions have failed and suspended business during the past three years as the result of said depression, thereby depriving millions of people in the United States of their life savings and greatly depreciating or entirely wiping out the investments of many more millions of people who deposited and invested their savings through such institutions;

Whereas millions of destitute and hungry men, women, and children, as the result of the conditions to which reference is hereinabove made, are walking the streets and tramping the highways in every State, Territory, and community in the United States seeking in vain for employment, and will starve to death unless a wise and beneficent government spreads over them the shield of its protection and makes suitable provision for their sustenance;

Whereas the present and preceding administrations of the United States Government have repeatedly placed themselves upon record as being in favor of conserving the natural resources of the Government, consisting of forests, minerals, water powers, and other tangible and intangible property rights belonging to the people;

Whereas billions of dollars annually are collected by the United States and State governments in taxes to maintain the Army, Navy, and police forces of the United States, and the several States and municipalities of the Union for the purpose of conserving the public peace and of protecting public and private property, all of which is an indirect contribution to the principle of conservation;

Whereas the men, women, and children of the United States constitute the most vital, valuable, and important natural resources of the Government of the United States and of the several States of which it is composed;

Whereas the conservation of the life, health, happiness, and general welfare of the people of this Union is imperatively necessary to the prosperity and welfare of the Nation;

Whereas the Government of the United States of America has heretofore appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars for the relief of the farming class throughout the United States;

Whereas the United States Government has also appropriated more than $2,000,000,000 for the relief of banks, railroads, and other industrial and commercial institutions throughout the United States;

Whereas the Government of the United States has seen fit to declare a moratorium on international debts to the United States from European countries in the aggregate of more than $10,000,000,000;

Whereas William Randolph Hearst has proposed that the Government of the United States issue and sell its bonds in the aggregate of $5,000,000,000 for the purpose of creating a fund to be administered by the Government in the creation and construction of public works and public buildings throughout the United States, for the purpose of giving employment and relief to the unemployed;

Whereas the payment of an outright dole is contrary to the traditions of the American people, and would offend the pride and sense of propriety of many millions of persons who would be compelled to accept the same or starve, except as an absolute last resort; and

Whereas the United States Government could give employment and furnish relief to many millions of unemployed, hungry men, women, and children, and thereby enable them to maintain their self-respect, and at the same time to furnish to the Government full value for the means of their support by and through the Hearst plan of unemployment relief: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Unemployed Citizens' League, of the city of Auburn, county of King and State of Washington, does hereby approve the plan for the relief of the unemployed advocated by William Randolph Hearst, to which reference is hereinabove made, and does hereby petition the Congress and President of the United States to adopt and carry out such plan; and be it further

Resolved, That the president and secretary of this organization be, and they hereby are, directed to certify and forward copies of this resolution to the Washington delegation in Congress, and particularly to the two United States Senators from this State and the Congressmen from this district.

The annexed and foregoing resolution is hereby proposed by the following committee

ROSCOE ENSLEY.
A. L. FIELDS.
L. P. CLARK.

The undersigned, A. R. Walter and L. E. Tiffany, president and secretary, respectively, of the Unemployed Citizens' League of Auburn, King County, Wash., hereby certify that the annexed and foregoing instrument is a true and correct copy of the resolution passed by said Unemployed Citizens' League, at a regular meeting thereof, at Auburn, in King County, Wash., on the 13th day of May, 1932.

A. R. WALTER, President.

Attest:

L. E. TIFFANY, Secretary.

The second resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, as follows:

Whereas the United States of America is suffering from a nationwide commercial, industrial, financial, and economic depression which has resulted in the closing of thousands of industrial and commercial institutions throughout the United States during the past three years, as the result of which millions of laborers have been thrown out of employment and deprived of a means of providing the necessities of life for themselves and families;

Whereas there are now in the United States of America approximately 45,000,000 people who are directly and indirectly affected by such unemployment on the part of heads of families and others having dependents whose standards of living are greatly reduced or whose means of livelihood are entirely cut off as the result thereof;

Whereas thousands of banks, savings banks, loan associations, and other investment and financial institutions have failed and suspended business during the past three years as the result of said depression, thereby depriving millions of people in the United States of their life savings and greatly depreciating or entirely wiping out the investments of many more millions of people who deposited and invested their savings through such institutions;

Whereas property of every kind and description in each State and community in the United States has greatly depreciated as the result of said depression, thereby greatly reducing or entirely cutting off the income of millions of people;

Whereas many millions of people in every State and community in the United States have been compelled, because of the conditions to which reference is hereinabove made, to place mortgages upon their homes in order to live, and are unable, because of want of employment or loss of income due to the conditions to which reference has been made, to pay said mortgages, or in many cases, the interest thereon;

Whereas millions of people in the United States will lose their homes as the result of foreclosures of mortgages due to the conditions to which reference is hereinabove made unless they receive relief from the United States Government;

Whereas the Government of the United States of America has heretofore appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars for the relief of the farming class throughout the United States;

Whereas the United States Government has also appropriated more than $2,000,000,000 for the relief of banks, railroads, and other industrial and commercial institutions throughout the United States;

Whereas the Government of the United States has seen fit to declare a moratorium on international debts to the United States from European countries in the aggregate of more than $10,000,000,000; and

Whereas the future stability and welfare of the Government of the United States depends primarily upon the owners of homes and other small property owners, each and all of whom are equally entitled to the considerations and paternal protection of the Government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Unemployed Citizens' League, of the city of Auburn, County of King and State of Washington, be, and it hereby is, in favor of Congress and the President of the United States declaring a moratorium upon the payment of all mortgages and other obligations upon homes in the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That the president and secretary of this organization be, and they hereby are, directed to certify and forward copies of this resolution to the Washington delegation in Congress, and particularly to the two United States Senators from this State, and the Congressman from this district.

The annexed and foregoing resolution is hereby proposed by the following committee:

The undersigned, A. R. Walter and L. E. Tiffany, president and secretary, respectively, of the Unemployed Citizens' League, of Auburn, King County, Wash., hereby certify that the annexed and foregoing instrument is a true and correct copy of the resolution passed by said Unemployed Citizens' League, at a regular meeting thereof, at Auburn, in King County, Wash., on the 13th day of May, 1932.

A. R. WALTER, President.

Attest:

L. E. TIFFANY, Secretary.

BALANCING THE BUDGET

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I present a petition. I have a large number of these petitions, signed by more than 5,000 citizens of New Jersey, praying that we balance the Budget; stop all raids on the Treasury, including the cash bonus; that we cut Government expense to the bone but preserve the national defense; that we enact fair sales and stamp taxes, amend the Volstead Act, and tax light wine and beer. I ask that the body of the petition, without the names, be printed in the RECORD and that it be appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and the body of it is as follows:

MAY, 1932.

The Hon. HAMILTON F. KEAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: We, the undersigned citizens and residents of New Jersey, respectfully request you to use your influence in Congress to have the following items favorably acted upon with the least possible delay:

Balance Budget.
Stop all raids on our Treasury, including cash bonus.
Cut Government expense to bone but preserve national defense.
Enact fair sales and stamp taxes.
Amend Volstead Act and tax light wine and beer.

TROPICAL OILS AND THE FARMER

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, the farmers and the dairymen of Minnesota are opposed to the competition of the coconut cow. They are opposed to the tremendous importation of vegetable oils that tend to reduce to their own level of price animal fats.

The Minneapolis Tribune of April 21 contains an editorial precisely to the point. I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TROPICAL OILS AND THE FARMER

The Hare bill, giving freedom to the Philippines, which is now before the Senate, is no doubt drawn in the interest of the Filipinos' political aspirations. But it gives little or no consideration to the American farmer whose market for the vegetable and animal fats produced on the American farms has been taken away from him.

The bill provides that for the next eight years the Philippines will be permitted to send to America, duty free, 200,000 long tons of coconut oil. This is an amount excessive of any inmportation from the Philippines up to the present time. The bill provides that the American farmer shall be in the same position in regard to his market for fats and oils for the next eight years as he is now.

To make the situation of the American farmers still worse, copra from all countries is admitted duty free into the United States. Even if the Philippines should reach the maximum amount of duty-free oil importations, they would still have the opportunity to send duty free into the United States an unlimited amount of copra which would be ground into coconut oil by the Pacific coast mills.

It makes no difference whatever to the American farmer whether the copra is ground into coconut oil in the Philippines or in the United States; he is robbed of his market just the same.

Congress and the two dominant political parties will be obliged, if they make any pretense of doing anything for the American farmer, to consider the whole field of tropical oil production.

Is it anything but absurd that we should be compelled to export 787,000,000 pounds of animal fats, while at the same time we import into this country 1,800,000,000 pounds of oils and fats?

It is true that we have a duty of 3 cents a pound on lard, but what does that amount to when we export 787,000,000 pounds? When we break down these figures of imports and exports the absurdity grows. While we export 787,000,000 pounds of animal fats which we are forced to sell in Europe at any price Europe chooses to offer us, we admit into this country 1,300,000,000 pounds of vegetable oils grown in the tropics. We import free of duty nearly twice as much vegetable oil as we export animal fats. While we are sending this 787,000,000 pounds of animal fats begging to the markets of Europe, we are bringing into this country copra, coconut oil, palm oil, Chinese wood oil, tung oil, inedible olive oil, palm-kernel oil, cod-liver oil, cod oil, vegetable tallow, sweet almond oil, croton oil, and rapeseed oil free of duty to a total of 1,300,000,000 pounds.

What has been the effect of this tremendous flow of tropical oils into the United States? The figures show that in the last 30 years, despite our tremendous gain in population, the number of hogs on American farms has not increased. In 1900, when the population of the United States was 76,000,000, we had 62,868,000 hogs on the American farm. In 1930, when the population of the United States was 122,000,000, the number of hogs on the American farm had decreased to 53,238,000.

In the face of these figures can anyone seriously maintain that the American farmer has been given the American market as has been promised him in every presidential campaign?

IMPORTATION OF LUMBER

Mr. FLETCHER presented a letter from Oliver P. Caldwell, New York City, N. Y., which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LUCKENBACH STEAMSHIP CO. (INC.),
New York, N. Y., April 28, 1932.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: There are before Congress for consideration two matters which are of vital importance in so far as they affect one particular industry, and that is lumber.

The bills are amendments H. R. 10236 and H. R. 8688.

I have no financial interest directly or otherwise in the lumber business, but I am chairman of the lumber committee of the United States Intercoastal Steamship Conference. The troubles of the intercoastal steamship operators have had much publicity, regarding which you are undoubtedly fully posted.

I have given much thought to the effect of Canadian lumber on both United States lumber operators and United States steamship operators. How can United States lumber operators in present difficult times maintain themselves in face of—

Foreign exchange rates?
Foreign labor?
Foreign steamship rates?

Foreign lumber is to-day being brought into the United States on foreign steamers on a basis that makes it almost impossible for United States dealers to do business.

It is the consensus of opinion of intercoastal steamship operators that on stability of eastbound lumber largely depends stability of this very important branch of our merchant marine. How can that stability be maintained if the principal commodity is permitted to be distributed on a lower basis by foreign interests than by American interests?

In addition to your other burdens, permit me to urge your careful consideration of this very important subject.

I am not writing you as a result of any committee or conference action but to express conclusions arrived at after 12 years of close contact with and careful study of the intercoastal lumber trade.

That my business competitors are agreeable to my acting as chairman of the lumber committee may be taken as evidence I know my subject.

Very truly yours,

OLIVER P. CALDWELL.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BARBOUR:

A bill (S. 4727) to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act for the purpose of providing for employment through the construction of works of a national character, to provide funds therefor, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. TYDINGS:

A bill (S. 4728) to provide for separate patents in case of any invention constructed in types or forms suitable for different uses; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. NORBECK:

A bill (S. 4729) granting a pension to Mattie Gilbertson (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4730) granting an increase of pension to Malinda Beard (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BULKLEY:

A bill (S. 4731) granting a pension to Florella Roe (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON:

A bill (S. 4732) granting a pension to Fred Barker (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4733) granting a pension to Laura F. Collins (with an accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 4734) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Watson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HAYDEN:

A bill (S. 4735) to authorize the acceptance of relinquishments by the State of Arizona and the City of Tempe, Ariz., to certain tracts of lands granted by the act of April 7, 1930, and to direct the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to said tracts to the Salt River Valley Water Users Association; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 4736) to authorize the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. to extend its present track connection with the United States navy yard so as to provide adequate railroad facilities in connection with the development of Buzzards Point as an industrial area in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REVENUE AND TAXATION—AMENDMENT OF THE AGRICULTURAL MARKETING ACT

Mr. NYE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10236, the revenue and taxation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

FLOOD CONTROL, LOWER RIO GRANDE VALLEY, TEX.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I submit two reports on flood-control investigations of the lower Rio Grande, one being a special report on flood-control investigations and the other being a report on preliminary investigations for flood control of the lower Rio Grande Valley, Tex., to be referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to having them made Senate documents.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a very interesting letter which the Hon. W. Cameron Forbes, recently ambassador from the United States to Japan and former Governor General of the Philippines, has written to my colleague the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] in regard to the Philippine bill introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING]. In view of the great interest in the bill and the importance of the communication and the value of the opinion of former Governor General Forbes in this matter I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

J. M. FORBES & Co.,
Boston, Mass., May 7, 1932.

Hon. FREDERIC C. WALCOTT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: On our recent interview you were kind enough to ask my opinion regarding the Philippine bill introduced by Senators HAWES and CUTTING and favorably reported to the Senate by the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs. I have now gone over the bill with some care, and, in my opinion, it is important that if adopted it should be strengthened by a few amendments, which I shall take the liberty of suggesting.

While I personally believe that the interest of the Philippine Islands would be best served by a continuance of American sovereignty, under the present law, with such changes and alterations in the development of self-government as conditions may counsel, I can not but recognize the fact that, with the strong feeling manifested by the recent vote in the House of Representatives, and which I understand prevails likewise in the Senate, some steps will undoubtedly be taken by our Government to end the present uncertainty and to stabilize the situation in the Philippines. It must be recognized that if some change in the political status of the Philippine people is not agreed upon now, it is practically certain that there will be a continuation of the agitation of recent years, with recurrent introduction of bills that would have an unsettling effect upon the people of the islands and a tendency to delay their progress.

I think the best compromise would be to pass some such measure as the Hawes-Cutting bill now before the Senate, with some amendments clarifying the provisions of the bill referring to the powers reserved to the United States during the period of transition in which American sovereignty would continue in the islands, thus making sure that conditions are such as will redound to the credit of the American Government and to the benefit of the Philippine people. In the report from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs of the Senate, accompanying the Hawes-Cutting bill, there appears under the heading, "Recognition of American Authority," the following statement regarding the transitional period:

"Pending the consummation of independence United States sovereignty will be represented in the Philippines by a high commissioner, who shall be recognized as such representative by all the departments of the Philippine government.

"The high commissioner will act as the representative of the United States, and he is vested with all the prestige and authority required for the discharge of such responsibility. He shall have access to all of the records of the government and have means at his disposal to acquaint himself with the manner in which the government of the commonwealth is conducted.

"Should any of the eventualities described in the bill, involving either the finances or the orderly functioning of the government, occur, the way is clear for the exercise of authority by the United States to remedy such condition.

"The governmental powers reserved to the United States and the United States high commissioner are effective to insure an efficient administration of public affairs in the Philippines."

I am in entire agreement with these views of the committee. In the report which General Wood and I submitted to President Harding in 1921, we said with emphasis that the United States should never find itself in the Philippines in a situation of responsibility without authority; and President Coolidge has expressed this view unequivocably. So long as our sovereignty obtains in the islands our responsibility must necessarily continue, and with this thought in mind I think the bill should express more clearly the authority reserved to the United States pending the grant of independence to intervene "for the preservation of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands and for the maintenance of the government as provided in their constitution, and for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty, and for the discharge of government obligations under and in accordance with the provisions of their constitution." I also believe it necessary to include in the staff of the high commissioner a financial expert through whom a duplicate copy of the reports of the insular auditor should be submitted to the high commissioner and to whom appeals from the decisions of the auditor could be taken.

With the adoption of these suggestions I believe that the authority of the United States would be well defined and I then should find no valid reason to believe that a workable solution of the Philippine problem might not ensue.

With reference to the economic features of the bill, I think it is a matter of simple justice to the people of the Philippine Islands that if limitations are to be placed upon the quantities of certain products admitted into the United States free of duty, such limits should not be less than the amount of importations of such products at the present day. To lessen the amount would cause an undue hardship to established industries in the Philippine Islands and, moreover, would have the added disadvantage of tending to lessen their capacity for buying American products. Our foreign trade is none too great at the present time, and there is no question that the capacity of foreign countries or dependencies to purchase our goods will be measured, except for what is known as invisible exchange, almost directly by the amount of their goods which they can sell us.

The amendments to which I refer above and which I earnestly recommend are the following:

1. Add at the end of section 7, paragraph 2, the words "and also to take such action as in his judgment may be necessary in pursuance of the right of intervention reserved in paragraph (n), section 2, of this act."

2. Section 7, paragraph 4, delete, on page 31, line 13, the word "lawfully."

3. In section 7, page 31, line 19, after the word "Congress," change the period to a comma and insert the following: "including a financial expert or comptroller, who shall receive for submission to the high commissioner a duplicate copy of the reports of the insular auditor, and to whom appeals from decisions by the insular auditor could be taken."

I have hesitated to suggest changes in this measure, knowing the labor and time that the committee have given to the study of the bill. But in view of your kind request and of my deep interest in the welfare of the Philippine people and the good name of the United States in its relations to those people I have taken the liberty to propose these amendments in the light of my nine years' experience in the Philippine Islands, first as Secretary of Commerce and Police and then as Governor General.

Respectfully yours,

W. CAMERON FORBES.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Connecticut, chairman of our Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, caused to be inserted in the RECORD a short while ago a very informative, thoughtful, and, may I add, I think an epoch-making letter.

The letter is from the Hon. W. Cameron Forbes, former American Ambassador to Japan, for nine years Secretary of Commerce and Police, Vice Governor, and Governor General of the Philippines. He is, in addition, the author of a standard work on the history and government of the islands, one of the great histories that Americans have produced. It consists of two volumes, and I have been informed that its preparation cost Mr. Forbes nearly $250,000.

A man of his vast experience in the Philippines, not only a student but a participant in its history, holding high official position, supplemented later by official life as Ambassador to Japan, finally fits him for an expression of opinion which I know will be welcomed by both the American and the Philippine people, for these latter hold him in very high esteem.

The letter of Ambassador Forbes is in keeping with the marked change of sentiment on this subject expressed by a change of editorial opinion of the press of the United States. In my own State, for instance, the press last year were almost unitedly opposed to the independence of the Philippines. They have practically all changed their editorial opinion to one favoring it.

The ambassador's indorsement of Senate bill 3377 is most welcome; his approval will clarify the situation and make more certain a settlement.

The Hare bill, the philosophy and contents of which are very similar to those contained in Senate bill 3377, passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 306 to 47, and of the absentees 42 additional have since stated that if present they would have voted for the bill, which would have given it the very unusual approval of an affirmative vote of 348 out of a total of 435.

Ambassador Forbes's letter speaks for itself. It will be noted that he approves the passage of what is called the Hawes-Cutting bill, with some clarifying amendments. After consulting with Senator CUTTING, these amendments have been prepared, covering even the exact language employed in Ambassador Forbes's letter, and I send them to the desk now, and ask that they be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

The three amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. HAWES and Mr. CUTTING to the bill (S. 3377) to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution and form a government for the Philippine Islands, to provide for the independence of the same, and for other purposes, were ordered to lie on the table, to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 29, line 24, after the period insert the following: "The President shall also have authority to take such action as in his judgment may be necessary in pursuance of the right of intervention reserved under paragraph (n) of section 2 of this act."

On page 31, line 13, strike out the word "lawfully."

On page 31, line 19, after the word "Congress," change the period to a comma and insert the following: "including a financial expert or comptroller, who shall receive for submission to the high commissioner a duplicate copy of the reports of the insular auditor, and to whom appeals from decisions of the insular auditor may be taken."

Mr. HAWES. We believe these amendments should be adopted, especially as they come from such a high authority who has had such great and varied experiences in connection with the Philippine government and in the Far East in connection with all its problems.

Ambassador Forbes is right. As long as we retain the islands, there should be no question of the powers reserved to the United States during the period of transition from their status as a possession of the United States to the time of their independent nationhood.

I believe these amendments will make sure that conditions will redound to the credit of the American Government and to the benefit of the Philippine people.

In his letter Ambassador Forbes states:

I believe that the authority of the United States will be well defined, and then I should find no valid reason to believe that a workable solution of the Philippine problem might not ensue.

While Senate bill 3377 gave to the President the right to delegate to the high commission full authority to protect the sovereignty of the United States, the suggestion, followed by the amendments which I have introduced, gives this power direct to the commissioner, and strengthens the hands of the American fiscal agent.

The bill is intended to safeguard the interests of Americans for a reasonable term of years and the Philippine interests who were forced into a free-trade intercourse with the United States not by their own choice but by the direction of our Congress.

The ambassador in his letter wisely said:

I think it is a matter of simple justice to the people of the Philippine Islands that if limitations are to be placed upon the quantities of certain products admitted into the United States free of duty, such limits should not be less than the amount of importations of such products at the present day. To lessen the amount would cause an undue hardship to the established industries in the Philippine Islands, and, moreover, would have the added disadvantage of tending to lessen their capacity for buying American products.

It seems indeed fortunate that the ambassador, who has given so much of his time to the Far Eastern question and to a special study of the Philippine problem, should, near the close of the discussions which will set a definite date for the termination of our sovereignty, bring in practical suggestions and a harmonizing note. It is a fine thing for the American people and for the Filipino people that his rounded career should find this new place in history.

I am satisfied that this expression of opinion will have a far-reaching effect with the thoughtful students of this subject, and must impress itself upon the authorities both in the Philippines and in the United States.

Both the Senators from Connecticut have performed a valuable public service in giving this letter to the public and making it part of our national record, and it pleases both Senator CUTTING and myself to agree with the conclusions of the ambassador, and we shall urge the adoption of his proposed amendments.

This expression of opinion will clarify the situation so far as Japan is concerned, and the old oft-repeated "bugaboo" that Japan will seize the islands has been only part of the propaganda directed against independence in any form.

There are only 6,000 Japanese in the islands. They remain apart. They do not like the climate, and they have officially stated that they will sign articles of neutrality. The ambassador's statement furnishes another conclusive proof that there is no danger of such occupancy.

Mr. President, there is before the Senate an amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Minnesota proposing to place in this revenue act a tariff upon certain products coming from the Philippines. Time and again both committees in Congress and both branches of Congress have decided that until the Philippines become an independent nation or a definite date is set for their independence, it would be unjust to these people to place any restrictions upon their products. This applies to immigration as well as to their exports.

I have been requested by the Philippine commission now in the United States to ask for insertion in the RECORD, which I do now as part of my remarks, of a statement by this commission of the effect of the adoption of this amendment. The communication follows:

On May 16 Senator SHIPSTEAD submitted to the Senate an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10236, the revenue and taxation bill, now pending before the Senate. The amendment was ordered to lie on the table and, as printed on page 10249 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date, is as follows:

On page 245, after line 10, insert the following:

"(9) Copra; hempseed; palm nuts; kapok seed; palm nut kernels; tung nuts; rapeseed; perilla seed; sesame seed; rubber seed, 1 cent per pound. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

"(10) Coconut oil, the product of the Philippine Islands; palm oil; perilla and sweet almond oil; tung oil; herring oil; pilchard oil; whale oil; seal oil; sperm oil; crude, 2 cents per pound. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

"(11) Palm-kernel oil; sunflower oil; sesame oil; rapeseed oil; olive oil; all the foregoing if in inedible form, 2 cents per pound. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles."

In so far as it affects the Philippine Islands, the proposed amendments would impose a tax of 1 cent per pound on all copra coming from all parts of the world, including the Philippine Islands. Copra is now on the general free list of the United States tariff law.

The amendment also proposes to impose a tax of 2 cents per pound on "coconut oil, the product of the Philippine Islands."

In view of the provision that the "tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles," it is not clear whether the tax on copra is to apply to the Philippine Islands. However, taken in connection with the provision of the tax bill that "(5) Such tax shall be imposed in full notwithstanding any provision of the law granting exemption from or reduction of duties to products of any possession of the United States" (p. 240), it would seem that the real purport of the amendment is to include the Philippines.

The amendment proposed by Senator SHIPSTEAD is in effect an amendment to section 301 of the United States tariff act which provides free-trade reciprocity between the United States and the Philippines. On several occasions in the past attempts have been made to levy duty on the products of the Philippine Islands, principally sugar and coconut oil. All these attempts have failed. By overwhelming vote, both in the Senate and in the House of Representatives, during the last two years such proposals have been defeated on the ground that to levy duty on Philippine products while the islands remain under the American flag, the wards of America, would be unjust and discriminatory and in violation of the traditional policy of fair dealing which has always characterized America's administration of the Philippines. Moreover, it would seem unthinkable that the United States should restrict free imports from the Philippines or levy duty on their products while the Filipino people are compelled to admit duty-free into their market, without restriction, all American products and manufactures. This amendment, therefore, designs to accomplish by indirect process what Congress has repeatedly discountenanced when directly proposed in tariff bills.

The contemplated tax on coconut oil at 2 cents per pound in effect would apply to coconut oil coming from the Philippine Islands the rate which is fixed by the tariff act on all coconut oils coming from foreign countries. Such a tax would not only cripple but completely destroy the Philippine industry. Undoubtedly, it would result in stopping the importation of coconut oil from the Philippine Islands. Whatever advantages might accrue to American producers of fats and oils from this result, the real beneficiary would be not the American dairyman or farmer, but the American crushers of copra who would thus be freed from Philippine competition. The net outcome would merely be the transfer of the Philippine coconut oil-crushing industry to the United States, for coconut oil would continue to be used in competition with domestic dairy products.

The latest report published by the United States Department of Commerce shows that the shipment of copra into the United States for the first three months of 1932 was as follows:

Articles and countries from which imported	1931		1932
	Quantity	Value	Quantity	Value
	Pounds		Pounds
Copra	118,969,446	$3,376,065	138,319,915	$2,519,880
British Malaya	9,154,812	247,826	29,692,503	510,918
Netherlands East Indies	14,979,251	414,964	36,821,723	703,487
Philippine Islands	66,148,223	1,870,790	51,568,882	945,010
Australia	7,680,751	234,622	8,318,364	144,187
British Oceania	10,961,281	316,872	6,224,904	101,981
French Oceania	6,172,963	186,211	4,309,524	88,937

The same report shows the shipment of coconut oil, product of the Philippine Islands, for the same two periods to be as follows:

1931

Coconut oil, product of the Philippine Islands:
Quantity (pounds) ---------- 96,273,974
Value ---------- $5,237,354

1932

Coconut oil, product of the Philippine Islands:
Quantity (pounds) ---------- 71,940,571
Value ---------- $2,251,916

An analysis of these statistics shows a decided increase in the importation of copra from practically every source except the Philippine Islands, where there was a marked decrease. Again, the importation of coconut oil from the Philippine Islands this year is considerably less than during the corresponding period of last year.

The obvious fact is that more coconut oil enters the United States free of duty in the form of copra from other countries than enters as coconut oil from the Philippine Islands.

Free-trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands are a result of a development influenced principally by political and moral considerations. Since the inception of American sovereignty over the Philippine Islands free trade has been considered by the American Government as the "logical result" of the relationship thereby created.

This was clearly stated by the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives in 1905. The Republican majority, speaking for the committee, said in its report:

"The only logical result from our possession of the Philippine Islands is free trade between the islands and the rest of the United States. It is definitely settled that we retain them until the people are prepared for self-government. * * * They are wards of the United States, a part of our common country, and are entitled to fair trade relations It is now as much our 'plain duty' to give them free trade as soon as practicable as it was in the case of Puerto Rico."

On the same occasion the minority stated the Democratic policy with regard to the Philippines, declaring:

"That all articles the growth and product of the Philippine Archipelago coming into the United States from the Philippine Archipelago shall hereafter be admitted free of duty."

In 1909, when free trade, with certain restrictions, which were later abolished, was established between the United States and the Philippines, Senator Elihu Root, in opposing the restrictions, said:

"You have the power. By the fortune of war the supreme, the irresistible power of this great Nation has been set over the weak and distracted people of the Philippines. But the possession of power carries with it an obligation that rises above all considerations of trade, all considerations of particular and of selfish interests—an obligation that we must recognize. If we do not, dishonor is the name of America. Terrible and arbitrary power that we exercise over these poor people, and they are helpless! They must accept our words.

"I for one, sir, am not willing to vote for a bill which, in my judgment, secures this great and powerful Nation an undue advantage over the weak people of the Philippine Islands."

"I believe, sir, that we have now upon us a duty we can not escape but must perform, and that we shall be engaged in the performance of that duty doubtless with many protests and many expressions of dissatisfaction but with fine, faithful, and loyal purpose on the part of the American people. I am not one of those, sir, who think that my country will be the worse for the great performance of this great act of unselfish altruism which befits the mission of liberty and justice to the poor and the weak of the earth that is a part of our heritage from our fathers."

In 1913 when the Democratic Party came into power and all restrictions on the free importation of tobacco, sugar, and rice from the Philippines were eliminated, Mr. Underwood, financial leader and spokesman of the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives, thus defined the stand of his party on this question:

"The change in this paragraph of the bill is largely striking out the limitation on the importation of sugar, filler and cigar tobacco and wrapper tobacco * * *. We may leave the limit where it is * * * but we would leave it where it is to the shame of every American citizen. We could not honestly face these dependent people who give us free trade in their markets if we close our doors to the only imports that they might possibly send here * * *. Because we do not want to stand and face the world in such a position as that and say [to the Filipinos] that 'under our law we command you to open the door, so that American goods can flow into your country,' because we have the power to do it, and then turn around and say to them that on the only thing that they can import, practically, into our country and make a market for we will close our doors and prevent them developing their trade. I say that no true-born American citizen who faces this question fairly and squarely and understands the situation will consent to that."

These pronouncements reveal the evident unanimity of policy pursued by both political parties as regards American-Philippine trade relations. Republicans and Democrats alike contributed their share of generous altruism in the treatment of the Philippines that has brought about the present reciprocal free-trade legislation. To this may be added that it was President Taft, first civil governor of the Philippines, who initiated this policy; but it fell to the lot of President Wilson to carry it to full accomplishment.

Free trade between the United States and the Philippine Islands has aided in the development of that country. But the advantages have not all been one-sided. With increased production the Philippines has enlarged its purchasing power as a market for American products and manufactures. During the first three months of the current year the Philippine Islands purchased more dairy products of the United States than any other country. It was first in the purchase of cotton cloth from the United States. And during this period when there was a marked decrease of cotton-cloth exports from the United States the exports to the Philippines were more than double those of the preceding year. The Philippine Islands was fifth of all countries in the purchase of wheat flour from the United States. It was first in the purchase of cigarettes from the United States. It was second in the purchase of oranges from the United States. It was third in the purchase of automobile tires from the United States. It was second in the purchase of book paper, and was one of the largest purchasers of machinery and of petroleum and its products from the United States.

Proposals to discriminate against Philippine products entering the United States bring up not merely economic questions but political questions. They involve not only the tariff but the political relationship between the United States and the Philippine Islands. They concern not only copra and oil but raise moral issues of tremendous import in the eyes of 13,000,000 Filipinos.

The approval of the proposed amendment would make the Philippines a domestic territory for one purpose and foreign territory for another. It would make the Philippines a part of the United States in so far as it is to America's advantage to make it so, but a foreign country, outside of your tariff walls, when its interests may in any way, real or imaginary, conflict with the interests of American producers and investors.

Such treatment would be extremely injurious to the Filipino people. It would mean a reversal of America's traditional policy with regard to them. It would place the United States on a course of economic exploitation of a dependent people.

There are now pending before the Senate the Hawes-Cutting bill and the Hare bill, both providing for a final and definite settlement of the Philippine problem, and pending independence regulating trade relations between the United States and the Philippines under terms which are considered adequate to safeguard the interests of both countries. The Hare bill passed the House of Representatives by a practically unanimous vote. The Hawes-Cutting bill has been included in the legislative program of the Senate, and it is to be expected that together with the Hare bill it will soon receive due consideration. It would seem only just and fair, therefore, to defer action on proposals such as those contained in the Shipstead amendment until the Philippine independence bills are laid before the Senate and the whole Philippine problem discussed in all its different phases.

Believing that you will not fail to see the injustice and unfairness of the proposed amendment as it affects the Philippine Islands, we make bold to hope that the amendment will be rejected.

Very respectfully,

For the Philippine mission:

SERGIO OSMENA.
MANUEL ROXAS.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION—LETTER FROM DISTINGUISHED CITIZENS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, yesterday I received a letter signed by a number of distinguished citizens. The letter was addressed to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] as majority leader in the Senate; to myself as minority leader in the Senate; the Hon. CHARLES R. CRISP as majority leader in the House of Representatives, that being an error, Mr. CRISP being the acting chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means; and the Hon. BERTRAND H. SNELL, minority leader in the House of Representatives.

The letter was signed by Hon. Nicholas Murray Butler; Messrs. William H. Crocker, of California; John G. Hibben, of New Jersey; Alanson B. Houghton, of New York; Frank O. Lowden, of Illinois; Charles Nagel, of Missouri; Alfred E. Smith, of New York; Wilbur L. Cross, of Connecticut; Joseph B. Ely, of Massachusetts; Roland S. Morris, of Pennsylvania; and Albert C. Ritchie, of Maryland.

The letter was given to the press by the authors and published throughout the country. I am going to ask to have printed in the RECORD the message referred to and my reply to it, which is being mailed this morning. I do not intend to enter upon a discussion of the subject matter of the letter. The reply contains all the statement I think appropriate to be made at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter and the reply of the Senator from Arkansas will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter and reply are as follows:

NEW YORK CITY, May 21, 1932.

Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR ROBINSON: It gives me pleasure to send you herewith a letter addressed to you as minority leader of the present Senate, which I trust you will find self-explanatory.

Each person whose name is attached thereto has personally authorized his signature.

With cordial greeting and regards, I am,

Faithfully yours,

NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER.

NEW YORK CITY, May 21, 1932.

Hon. JAMES E. WATSON,
Majority Leader United States Senate.
Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
Minority Leader United States Senate.
Hon. CHARLES R. CRISP,
Majority Leader House of Representatives.
Hon. BERTRAND H. SNELL,
Minority Leader House of Representatives.

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned view with so much concern the possible effect upon our social and political institutions of the grave economic and financial problems which confront the American people that, on behalf of vast numbers of our fellow citizens, we appeal through you to the Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives to lay aside every form of partisanship and of possible partisan advantage and quickly to unite to adopt a balanced Federal Budget for the coming fiscal year, as well as to enact a plan of taxation which shall be economically sound, fair to every group and calling, and without discrimination or privilege or class or sectional advantage of any kind.

It is our judgment that conditions are so grave that this action should be taken at the earliest possible moment.

Respectfully,

NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER, New York.
WILLIAM H. CROCKER, California.
JOHN GRIER HIBBEN, New Jersey.
ALANSON B. HOUGHTON, New York.
FRANK O. LOWDEN, Illinois.
CHARLES NAGEL, Missouri.
WILBUR L. CROSS, Connecticut.
JOSEPH B. ELY, Massachusetts.
ROLAND S. MORRIS, Pennsylvania.
ALBERT C. RITCHIE, Maryland.

MAY 23, 1932.

The Hon. NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER,
Broadway at One hundred and sixteenth Street,
New York City.

MY DEAR MR. BUTLER: I am in receipt of a letter signed by you; Messrs. W. H. Crocker, California; John G. Hibben, New Jersey; Alanson B. Houghton, New York; Frank O. Lowden, Illinois; Charles Nagel, Missouri; Alfred E. Smith, New York; Wilbur L. Cross, Connecticut; Gov. Joseph B. Ely, Massachusetts; Rowland S. Morris, Pennsylvania; and Gov. Albert C. Ritchie, of Maryland, addressed to Senator WATSON as majority leader; myself as minority leader in the Senate; Hon. CHARLES R. CRISP, as majority leader in the House of Representatives; and Hon. BERTRAND H. SNELL, minority leader in that body.

The Members of the Senate and the House are requested in the message "to lay aside every form of partisanship and of possible partisan advantage and quickly unite to adopt a balanced Federal Budget for the coming fiscal year," etc.

May I say in reply that from the beginning of the present session of Congress a sincere effort has been made to pursue the course suggested, and it is my belief that a fair review of the proceedings in both bodies will disclose practical unanimity of purpose to balance the Budget without regard to partisan advantage. This policy has been rendered somewhat difficult by the continuous delivery of partisan addresses and announcements by members of the President's Cabinet and others occupying high places in the national administration. The injection of tariff provisions in the revenue bill has without doubt resulted in some confusion and is calculated to cause delay in the passage of the revenue bill.

The differences which from time to time have arisen touching the legislation seem not so much attributable to sectional or partisan controversies as to varying economic viewpoints.

Recognizing the grave conditions which prevail, it is my purpose, in so far as I am able, to continue to contribute to just and fair conclusions touching the very important subjects referred to in your message.

Please be kind enough to advise those who joined in your message of this reply.

Sincerely,

JOS. T. ROBINSON.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Several messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On May 19, 1932:

S. 2409. An act to amend Title II of the Federal farm loan act in regard to Federal intermediate-credit banks, and for other purposes.

On May 20, 1932:

S. 418. An act to extend the admiralty laws of the United States of America to the Virgin Islands;

S. 694. An act to authorize the sale of interest in lands devised to the United States under the will of Sophie Chanquet;

S. 1335. An act to remove the limitation upon the filling of vacancy of district judge for the district of New Jersey;

S. 2498. An act to authorize the transfer of jurisdiction over public land in the District of Columbia;

S. 4148. An act to permit the United States to be made a party defendant in certain cases; and

S. 4416. An act to provide for the transfer of certain school lands in North Dakota to the International Peace Garden (Inc.).

On May 21, 1932:

S. 290. An act to establish a memorial to Theodore Roosevelt in the National Capital; and

S. 2955. An act to amend the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6477) to further extend naturalization privileges to alien veterans of the World War residing in the United States.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. TRAMMELL to the amendment of the committee, on page 244, line 7, after the word "measure," to insert:

Phosphate rock (phosphorites, collophane, and apatites) containing more than 70 per cent of tribasic phosphate of lime, 8 cents per 100 pounds.

So as to make the committee amendment read:

(6) Lumber, rough, or planed or dressed on one or more sides, $3 per 1,000 feet, board measure; phosphate rock (phosphorites, collophane and apatites) containing more than 70 per cent of tribasic phosphate of lime, 8 cents per 100 pounds; but the tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate very long in giving my reasons for supporting the amendment advocated by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] proposing a duty on lumber, and for favoring the amendment to that amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] providing for a duty on phosphate. The two amendments should be considered together.

The lumber industry of the United States is now operating at approximately 20 per cent of its capacity. The object of this amendment is to provide an equalization of competitive conditions for the American forest industry. It has been stated, and I assume that it is true, that Canadian trade agreements with Australia, South Africa, England, Ireland, and Scotland provide for preferential duties over other countries, and the general depreciation of foreign currencies has practically eliminated the exportation of lumber by the United States to countries which heretofore have consumed tremendous quantities. I have a letter this morning—whether it states the facts or not I am not prepared to say, but I have no reason to doubt its accuracy—to the effect that France has imposed an embargo on lumber. At any rate, our foreign markets have been almost eliminated. The industry is confined to the domestic market, which has fallen off very materially.

In Florida 9 or 10 immense mills have been closed down. They have on hand stocks of lumber sufficient to supply the demand at the present rate for two years or more. Other mills are running on part time. Many men have necessarily been dismissed and thrown out of work; many others are receiving not more than one-third of their ordinary pay. Hundreds of them are working for a dollar a day whose pay heretofore has been from $3 to $5 per day. It is important, therefore, and of interest to us, to see that the people employed in this industry are not disengaged, are not added to the number of unemployed, hopeless and helpless in this country. Many mills are operating on part time merely for the purpose of keeping their forces intact, so far as possible, and providing means for their living. Workers in this industry, to a large extent, are trained exclusively in the industry. They are men cutting logs, conveying logs to the mills, handling the logs at the mills and manufacturing them into lumber; they are engineers, foremen, sawyers, skilled men, who, if thrown out, can not engage in something else; there is nothing else available for them; they have no other opportunity for employment; and it is a cruel thing, a pitiable thing, to see this industry in such a state that it must turn off its employees, dismiss them, and confine its activities entirely to the domestic market, which at present is wholly inadequate to take their products.

It may be that the proposed duty will not very greatly advance the industry. Those engaged in it think it will. It certainly can do no harm to the industry and can not do the people of the country any harm. The consumers of the material will not have to pay higher prices, because the competition in the business itself will regulate that. With the stocks of lumber already on hand sufficient for years to come there will be terrific competition among the producers themselves, and there is no prospect whatever that a duty of this kind will increase the cost of lumber to the consumer. In addition to that, if there is a stimulation of the market, if there is encouragement to the industry such as to start the mills going, the output among all the mills will be such that it will be impossible to raise prices beyond a competitive level.

The importations from Canada, from Russia, and from other countries, where they dispose of their surplus at reduced prices in our markets, ought to be, to some extent, checked, if not eliminated.

I therefore favor the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington. I think it will mean a great deal to this very important industry in which millions of dollars have been invested and in which thousands of men are employed.

Then, Mr. President, I favor the amendment offered by my colleague with respect to phosphate. The situation in that regard is quite clearly set out in a statement which I inserted in the RECORD on Saturday by Mr. Martin H. Grace. I will not repeat all the details in connection with it. My colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] made a most admirable statement in regard to the subject on Saturday, and I do not care to repeat what has heretofore been said. I will call attention, however, to a few salient facts in connection with the proposed excise tax on phosphate rock.

The importation of phosphate rock into the United States is set forth by the Department of Commerce as follows: In 1926, 17,378 long tons, of a value of $192,611; in 1927, 28,195 tons; in 1928, 45,812 tons; in 1929, 44,899 tons; and in 1930, 32,658 tons, of a value of $377,177.

The phosphate industry is active in Florida, Tennessee, Idaho, Wyoming, and Montana, and the invested capital in the industry is placed at $67,000,000. It furnishes employment directly to some 4,000 men, and estimating 5 to a family, that means 20,000 persons are dependent upon this industry. The sales in 1930 amounted to 3,926,392 tons, of a value of $13,996,830.

The entire product is moved by railroad, thereby adding substantially $6,000,000 to their revenues. Coastwise vessels, which by law must be registered under the flag of the United States, transported about 1,500,000 tons, and benefited to the extent of more than $2,500,000. That gives an idea of the importance and significance of this industry.

Florida is greatly interested, because in that State there is mined something like 80 per cent of the phosphate mined in this country.

The principal threat to the American phosphate industry is in the operations in the French protectorate of Morocco, where the Moroccan Government exercises a monopoly of the production and sale of phosphate rock and employs Arab labor, which is paid wages of about 25 cents a day. The material is transported from the mines over Government-owned railroads to Government docks at the port, and the total cost of mining, drying, refining, and transporting figures up to $2.80 per gross ton free on the dock at Casablanca, Morocco, at which point it is placed aboard vessels at a cost for wharfage and handling of less than one-fifth of the sum paid in the equivalent Florida ports.

That, Mr. President, gives a picture of the monopoly under the Moroccan Government, where the supply seems to be unlimited, where labor is paid 25 cents a day, where the Government railroad carries the product at cost, and where the Government docks afford facilities for its transportation, all at rates one-fifth of what it costs the producer in this country.

Furthermore, the Moroccan phosphate industry is reaching out not only after all the European market, which formerly took the phosphate from this country, but to a large extent it is absolutely determined to dominate the markets of the world and is preparing to import this material into the United States in vastly increased quantities.

The Moroccan operations commenced in 1921, in which year 8,100 tons were produced and sold. In the year 1930, 1,779,000 tons were produced and sold.

The policy of the Moroccan Government monopoly is to dominate the high-grade markets of the world at any price. Low ocean freight rates are helpful to them. Doubtless they bring a large amount of this material, or are prepared to do so, to the United States in ballast, so that the transportation is very cheap.

When Morocco commenced importations to the United States in 1927 at a price of $4 per ton f. o. b. Casablanca, the American miners resorted to the antidumping provisions of the tariff law; and upon application the Secretary of the Treasury found that dumping was being practiced, as per his decision of February 9, 1928. That decision, however, has been appealed from, and the question is now in the courts. In October the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals will hold a term and pass upon the soundness of that conclusion of the Treasury Department, and may reverse it. It may declare it illegal, and then there will be no sort of protection to the American producer under the law.

The productive capacity of the present installations at Khouriga, based on the port of Casablanca, Morocco, is 2,500,000 tons per annum, plus 1,000,000 tons already mined, ready for shipment. For the past several years the Moroccan Government has been building up a new port, known as Safi, and has been constructing a new railroad from this port to new phosphate mines in that country.

The present monopoly is actively prosecuting work at this new mine for the erection of a plant that will be capable of producing an output duplicating that of the mines at Khouriga. It has also opened an office in New York, and is prepared now to go ahead with importing phosphate rock to the United States in immense quantities, at low rates of freight, under a Government monopoly.

The primary economic advantage to be derived from the maintenance of present operations in the mining of phosphate rock in the several States of Florida, Tennessee, Montana, Idaho, and Wyoming is the continued employment of 4,000 workers who would be thrown out of work by the cessation of this mining. Upon the basis of five persons to a family, this would amount to 20,000 people whose means of support would be taken away from them should phosphate-mining operations in the United States cease; and the present condition of the industry is such that it can not carry on with this sort of competition. The supply in Morocco is unlimited, as I have stated. The Moroccan producers have reached out and are taking away from us many of our foreign markets in Europe, and they are now coming here with their phosphate to take away our domestic market. Our producers can not produce the material at the cost at which this monopoly produces it, paying 25 cents a day for labor; and with the low rate of freight it is impossible for us to live under those conditions. Our mines will have to close down. That means a loss of employment to the people engaged in the industry, and the sacrifice of the immense capital—some $67,000,000—invested in the industry; and once the monopoly is thoroughly established and takes possession of our market, there is no telling where the price will go. They will be in position to charge what they please for phosphate. We will be eliminated, and they will fix their own price. They are, therefore, interested in delivering their materials here even below the cost of production in order to capture this immense market.

I desire to point out that my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] has so framed this amendment that it can not possibly meet with any objection upon the theory that it might add to the cost of fertilizer. The phosphate described in the amendment does not enter into the manufacture of fertilizer. It enters into the chemical industry. He has fixed the grade of the phosphate at such a figure, as will be seen by the amendment, that it has no application whatever to the phosphate that goes into fertilizer. Consequently there need be no anxiety on that score on the part of the people who are interested in that subject—and I am one of them. I would not venture to advocate here a proposal that would increase the price of fertilizer to the farmers of the country, notwithstanding it might benefit some particular industry in my State. Generally speaking, I could not support any proposition here that taxed the farmers of the United States. This amendment will not do it. Even if it did apply to the kind of phosphate that entered into the manufacture of fertilizer, in my judgment the competition would prevent a rise in the cost of fertilizer to the consumer.

This amendment, however, does not apply to that kind of phosphate at all. It is 70 per cent fine. It is the higher-grade product. It goes into the chemical industry. That is the only kind of phosphate that is referred to in this amendment. It can not, therefore, possibly have any influence whatever on the price of fertilizer. It gives a degree of care and consideration for the highest-grade phosphate that enters into the chemical industry and does not enter into the manufacture of fertilizer.

Therefore I think there is no valid argument against this amendment upon any ground whatsoever. Once this foreign monopoly dominates the American market, shutting down the American mines, the price of phosphate in the United States will be raised to far higher levels than that of to-day. To-day prices are the result of free competition among freely competing fields and between freely competing producers in each field with capacity easily sufficient to supply twice the normal consumption of the United States.

The statement furnished by Mr. Grace asserts—and I have every reason to rely upon its accuracy:

> We know that the Moroccan Government has got all its plans set for the invasion of this market and that headquarters have been established in New York City. We do not think it can be entirely repelled. We believe that even if an excise tax of one-tenth cent per pound should be imposed, nevertheless there would be an increased movement of phosphate from abroad into this country and that the figure of 250,000 tons is not too much to be expected, and that if our request for such an excise tax is granted the Government would derive a revenue of approximately half a million dollars per annum.

That is the revenue side of the matter. There would still be imported a certain amount, say 250,000 tons, from Morocco, which would have its effect upon our markets; but undoubtedly we would receive from it a revenue of something like half a million dollars per annum.

So, Mr. President, I can see no argument whatever against this amendment to the amendment that is pending. Indeed, I should like to see the Senator from Utah accept it as a part of the committee amendment, and let us take a vote on the committee amendment as amended by the proposal of my colleague.

There comes to me this morning a point which I had not thought of before. This communication says:

> In the phosphate business we have always figured that an additional 10 cents in the cost of a barrel of oil means an additional cost of 5 cents per ton in the production of phosphate.

I did not know these people were so much interested in that subject; but this communication comes from those who know.

> Now, there are 42 gallons in a barrel of oil; and a tax of a half cent a gallon means that the cost of a barrel of fuel oil is going up 21 cents. Applying the above-mentioned rule, we get the result that the cost of production of phosphate will be increased by 10½ cents per ton.

So that by the action on Friday we will impose an additional burden on the producers of phosphate rock. If it be true that this tax on oil will increase the price to the consumer, they will be affected by an increase of 10½ cents per ton on their phosphate. So, as a matter of fairness, our friends who supported the oil tax ought to support this tax, because by imposing that tax they have added 10½ cents a ton to the cost of the producer of phosphate. I appeal to them, therefore, to be fair and just in this matter, and consider this item from that standpoint also.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION—LETTER FROM DISTINGUISHED CITIZENS

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I desire to advert for a few moments to a communication placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the distinguished leader of the minority, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], a communication signed by many distinguished citizens of the United States, in which they exhort us to lay aside every form of partisanship and of partisan advantage and to attend strictly to the business of the country.

Mr. President, coming from gentlemen with such knowledge of public affairs as these men possess, I confess that I am astonished at the contents of the communication. In very truth it comes many months late. It all the more astonishes me because of the apparent lack of knowledge on the part of these gentlemen of the situation in the Congress at this time, and of the conditions with which we have dealt and the manner in which we have dealt with them since the inception of this session.

Never in the history of this country, in any time of peace, has there been such a slight display of partisanship as during the present session of Congress in the Senate of the United States in dealing with the momentous problems which have confronted us from its beginning. In fact, from the time of the nonpartisan meeting of certain gentlemen in the White House last October, in which more or less of a plan of future legislation was formulated, down to this time, there has been as slight a manifestation of partisanship as I have ever known in my experience in Washington, or have ever come in contact with in reading the annals of previous sessions of Congress.

The moratorium was dealt with in nonpartisan fashion; there was no politics in it.

The bill for the establishment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was dealt with wholly in nonpartisan fashion. There was no thought of partisanship in the consideration of that measure.

The first Glass bill that was passed was dealt with in wholly nonpartisan fashion, both in the Committee on Banking and Currency and on the floor of the Senate of the United States.

The other bill reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency, which was laid aside for the temporary consideration of the revenue measure, was wholly nonpartisan, dealt with in nonpartisan fashion by the committee, and dealt with in nonpartisan fashion by the Senate up to the time when it was laid aside to make way for the more important pending legislation.

The pending bill itself, up to the present time, has been considered largely in a nonpartisan way, because, even considering the tariff proposals, to which I shall not in detail refer, there has been a division in both parties on both sides of the question.

Mr. President, the economy measure which is to come from the Committee on Appropriations within a few days is wholly nonpartisan. It is being dealt with in the Committee on Appropriations in a nonpartisan manner, and doubtless when it comes to the floor of the Senate it will be considered in the same way.

So far as I know, every problem of consequence which will come before Congress at this session will be dealt with in nonpartisan fashion; and I want now publicly to thank the leader on the other side and his colleagues and associates for having so often submerged their partisan opinions in order that we might enact legislation for the benefit of the country and the welfare of its people.

Therefore I think the communication to which reference has been made, which is a part of the general propaganda throughout the country to "soak" the Congress and to criticize the Senate for its "laggard" habits and its refusal to act upon important problems, is entitled to more than brief consideration.

Mr. President, people who are not familiar with legislative methods do not know of the many perplexities that confront us, of the many difficult situations which we have to meet as legislators. If they did know, instead of criticizing us throughout the country they would be praising us for the progress we have made and for the nonpartisan way in which we have handled these great questions.

I think it is due to the Senate and to my colleagues and associates on both sides to say that if the gentlemen who have written the letter do not understand the situation they should understand it, and if they have understood it they have temporarily forgotten it.

I make this statement because I think it due the Senate of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. I have concluded.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. If the Senator will yield, I want to call the attention of the Senator to the last few lines of this letter, and then to suggest an inquiry. The lines to which I refer are as follows:

> to adopt a balanced Federal Budget for the coming fiscal year, as well as to enact a plan of taxation which shall be economically sound, fair to every group and calling, and without discrimination or privilege or class or sectional advantage of any kind.

Mr. President, that is very general. The words mean nothing except a desire in which, I am sure, we all concur and join.

I wanted to ask the distinguished Senator from Indiana if he would not agree to this suggestion, that these distinguished gentlemen be asked to submit us a bill of particulars, and point out wherein we could do the things which they suggest should be done, more specifically and more definitely.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, in the consideration of a matter of this kind one must exercise due self-restraint. I do not think I want to answer the question of my honored friend, because it might lead me into some statements which might be considered somewhat extreme.

I think that if authors of the letter should formulate a plan, it would be one to which we would pay no attention, because, in my judgment, they could not sit down and consider the questions with which we have been dealing for weeks and suggest anything like as intelligent a solution as we now are engaged in working out for the country.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, that was the idea I had in suggesting the inquiry. If these gentlemen would suggest any relief, I think it would be so fallacious that the country would see immediately that it was fallacious.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the only reason why I rise to speak at all on this subject is because the communication which has just been put into the RECORD emanated from New York City. It is signed, among others, by several New York men, some of whom happen to be personal friends of mine.

I think it is utterly unfair for those outside of the Congress to criticize the Senate for its alleged failure to act on pending measures of great importance to the country. Purely voluntary letters are all right, of course, but I am flooded, as I assume other Senators are, with letters which are propaganda and nothing else. They are sent out by thousands of citizens of my State, finding fault with me, and finding fault with the Senate because of its failure to balance the Budget. It is not fair that those letters should be sent, because everybody who sits in this Chamber knows, and every well-informed person in America knows, that every honest effort is being made by every Senator here to balance the Budget. Every effort is being made to pass a tax bill which will be as reasonable as possible under the unfortunate circumstances in which the country finds itself.

I am surprised that these particular men, the signers of the letter before me, who are publicists, who are usually well informed regarding matters of public interest, should turn aside from their daily occupations to critize a body of men working day and night to accomplish the very things they have in mind.

In my opinion, the letter was gratuitous, and utterly uncalled for, and I want to say for the benefit of those of my constituents who pay any attention to what I may say, that on both sides of this Chamber there is an apparent determination to accomplish as speedily as possible exactly what the country is demanding. The Senate will not adjourn until the Budget is balanced, and until a tax bill is passed which will be as satisfactory as any measure to raise money can possibly be.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I think what the Senator has said will be indorsed by every Senator as to the mail he receives on any particular day. Nearly every correspondent expresses a desire that we balance the Budget. "We agree with you on this," they say. "Do it quickly."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. "But don't put any tax on me."

Mr. FESS. Yes. My mail is filled with letters stating, "Don't reduce the appropriation on this particular item," or "Don't put a tax on this item." The letters are about 50-50 to that effect. That indicates that while there is a desire on the part of the country to have the Budget balanced, the people have no conception of our problems. They are not in sympathy with what is our plain duty. The only thing I can see for us to do is to go ahead as we have been going, and do the best we can for the country at large.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio is entirely right. I want to refer to one flood of letters which came to my desk last week. They all came from Yonkers, N. Y., the envelopes were all typewritten on the same machine, and the letter itself was a stereotyped letter, each letter being signed by an employee of that particular concern. There were about 1,200 of the letters, all demanding the balancing of the Budget. They made, too, certain suggestions which would seem to me to be a strong intimation that a sales tax would permit that particular concern to be released from the burdens of an increased corporation tax or any other "legislation that will overtax the corporations." Following up those letters came personal letters from various of those employees disclaiming any voluntary act on their part in the signing of the letters.

Of course, Mr. President, we are more or less influenced, and doubtless properly so, by letters which come to us. But when a Senator is working night and day, as every Senator here is, to accomplish the very purposes suggested by our correspondents, it is an unnecessary tax upon our patience and upon our time to be flooded with such letters.

I want to say, for the benefit of my constituents, that I can see no indication on the part of any man in this body, whether he is of my party or of the other party, of a desire to delay action. I venture to predict that before many days have rolled around, we shall have accomplished all that the country has in mind, and the Senate will have adjourned, whether we are or are not loaded down with letters from responsible or irresponsible persons who are seeking to have us do the things which we are going to do anyhow.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator from Ohio and the Senator from New York have called attention to the propaganda that has gone abroad that we must balance the Budget. I think it would be rather interesting if Senators would take the time to examine the list of proposed excise taxes and take the letters which come to them urging that they balance the Budget, and the letters which come voicing opposition to the imposition of a tax on the article in which they are interested. I think it will be found that if the requests which come should be acceded to and the taxes complained of eliminated, we would get no revenue from the bill, even if we should pass the bill.

It is said that Josh Billings once remarked that he had lived 40 years before he found a good place for a boil. When asked what he considered a good place for a boil, he said, "On the other fellow's neck." These folks who write to us are perfectly willing to have the Budget balanced, "but do not balance it at the expense of the particular thing in which I am interested."

I think I shall take the time to make a list of the taxes opposed by the various parties interested in the excise taxes, and have the list incorporated in the RECORD, so it may be seen that if we should accede to the requests of these gentlemen who pretend to be interested in the balancing of the Budget, and should subtract from the proposed plans the articles which they ask to have taken out, we would have no bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I think there is another misconception taking possession of the public mind and portions of the press at this time which, before this particular discussion ends, might well be the subject of comment.

So much has been said in the press and elsewhere about the special so-called economy bill which is now in Senate committee that apparently thousands of our people have come to the conclusion that the only economy which is contemplated in respect to the annual expenditures by this Congress is encompassed within this one economy bill, which deals mainly with problems of consolidation and personnel. When the House reduced the proposed $200,000,000 economy bill to $40,000,000 or $50,000,000, the country immediately leaped into a rage because it came to the conclusion that $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 is the limit of congressional economy which is contemplated.

I think it is very much worth while in connection with the discussion to remind the country that this so-called economy bill is but one of many among these economy factors and objectives. We started in with a $350,000,000 economy through the Bureau of the Budget. We have already had $150,000,000 in economies by the action of the House in respect to these appropriation bills. This makes a total of $500,000,000. In addition to this tremendous total there will come whatever economy ultimately results from the Senate's additional 10 per cent reduction program. In addition to that will be whatever economies are available as a result of the legislation which will come from the recommendations of the Economy Committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Kenucky?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Purely as a matter of information, I should like to inquire of the Senator with reference to the $350,000,000 to which he refers first. We have seen a great deal in the press about the $350,000,000 reduction made in the Budget estimate. How does the Budget estimate, from which it is said $350,000,000 was taken, compare with the aggregate appropriations for last year, so we may ascertain whether the Budget reductions were below the actual expenses of last year, which ought to be the real criterion. If the departments boosted their estimates in order to make a showing of having the Budget reduced, it does not mean much; but if they reduced them below last year's actual expenses, it may amount to something.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am proceeding on the theory that the reductions to which I refer are below last year's expenditures. I do not have the figures at hand.

Mr. BARKLEY. The $350,000,000 to which the Senator refers was a so-called reduction below what the departments requested. I do not know how the request compared with what they actually got last year. In order to find out whether there has been $350,000,000 reduction it will be necessary to know that fact.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator is mistaken in his mathematics.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. My recollection is that the current appropriations for this fiscal year amount to over $5,000,000,000. The estimate by the departments amounted to something like $4,000,000,000 for this year. The Budget reduced those estimates by something over $300,000,000. My understanding is that before the estimate was sent down the President made a 5 per cent reduction in that amount.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator says the actual appropriations for the current year were about $5,000,000,000. That is true as to appropriations made by this session of Congress which are allocated to the fiscal year 1932. Subsequently we appropriated $500,000,000 for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, $125,000,000 for the Farm Loan Board, and other emergency appropriations which do not figure in the ordinary current expenses of the Government, so that in making up the $5,000,000,000 in order to show $1,000,000,000 reduction on the part of the Budget, which ranged something like $4,000,000,000 for this year, the Senator must, of course, exclude extraordinary appropriations which have been asked for by the President for this year, which make up that amount for the current year.

Mr. JONES. It was over $5,100,000,000, and then the deficiency appropriations were something over $200,000,000, which would make about $5,300,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. But it is true that these extraordinary appropriations have been allocated to the fiscal year 1932.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. So it is not a true picture of the actual reductions on the part of the Budget.

Mr. JONES. My recollection is that the Budget estimate is about $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 below the ordinary and usual expenditures of the Government for the last year or two. Then the House decreased the amount from that quite a good deal, so there is a very substantial reduction in what we might call the ordinary and usual expenditures of the Government and demands of the Government.

Mr. BARKLEY. Assuming that $350,000,000 was a reduction below the estimates of the members of the Cabinet—because that is what it really is—according to our program here, we will lop off another 10 per cent below the figures of the House if that program is carried through the entire list of appropriation bills. That would amount to something like $350,000,000 or $400,000,000, would it not?

Mr. JONES. I think about $250,000,000 or $300,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. I mean if all the appropriations are reduced 10 per cent, according to the instructions of the Senate when it sent the various appropriation bills back to the Appropriations Committee. If that plan is carried through and the average is $4,000,000,000, it will take off nearly $400,000,000.

Mr. JONES. It is going to take off a very considerable sum if that plan is followed through.

Mr. BARKLEY. I, too, am in favor of following it through.

Mr. JONES. We are confronted with the proposition of cutting 10 per cent from $1,000,000,000 provided for the soldiers. I do not believe there will be many Senators who will stand for that reduction.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I did not want to precipitate any discussion by way of detailed analysis because time is too precious. I am simply undertaking to correct what obviously is a misconception in the mind of the country respecting the extent and degree to which economy is being pursued at Washington.

The best possible demonstration of the fact that the country is erroneously measuring the situation is the Interior Department appropriation bill, which is the one bill that Congress has concluded and the President has signed. What are the facts at that point? There was $69,000,000 appropriated last year, $56,000,000 recommended by the Budget, $50,000,000 appropriated by the House, and $45,000,000 appropriated by the Senate, a net saving of about 35 per cent over the actual expenditures of last year without any reference whatever to the so-called economy bill, which is yet to be considered by the Senate.

The thing I am trying to say is that the country need not be discouraged about the congressional attitude toward economy, because there is a perfectly obvious intent and purpose upon both sides of the aisle and at both ends of the Capitol to save money so far as it is humanly possible. The Senate will be found particularly dependable in these aspects and objectives, as its record already warrants.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Purely as a matter of information, does the Senator believe that the Interior Department appropriation bill is a fair sample of what may happen with reference to all appropriation bills? Does he think we will make a similar reduction in the rest of them?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not think the total saving in the Interior Department bill can be carried through all the bills, but I do think it is a typical reflection of the purposes of Congress in respect to economy.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I desire to get the opinion of the Senator as to how much he estimates now can be saved in the way of possible elimination or reduction in expenses for the next fiscal year over the present year? That is what the country is interested to know.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator mean in respect of possible total economy?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall be very much disappointed if the total reduction is not three-quarters of a billion dollars.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is the information I desired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in that connection does the Senator mean below the $5,000,000,000 referred to a moment ago by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] or below the ordinary expenses of the Government?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I mean below the actual expenditures of the Government during the present fiscal year.

Mr. BARKLEY. That expenditure will be over $5,000,000,000, so the three-quarters of a billion referred to by the Senator as the possible reduction still leaves $4,250,000,000 as appropriations for the fiscal year 1933. Does the Senator mean we are compelled, in spite of all our efforts to economize, to appropriate $4,250,000,000 for Government expenses for the next fiscal year?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think if it is humanly possible for economy to be carried lower, Congress will carry it just as low as it can possibly go. I conceive this objective to be a paramount challenge. I continue to give it unqualified support. It seems to me that the Senate as a whole is similarly committed. The country should take courage from these realities instead of discouragement from an unwarranted belief that no serious or formidable reductions are being made in the Federal expenditures.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a comparative table showing the operating appropriations of the various departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, and the Budget estimates for the same departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, with a net decrease of $459,000,000.

Inasmuch as these tables show only the operating expenditures they do not include the debt service, which necessarily has had to increase in proportion as the debt itself has increased; and it is the increase in the debt service which finally brings this $459,000,000 back to approximately the net $350,000,000 in Budget saving to which I have adverted.

There being no objection, the table referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Expense of major departments, commissions, etc.

	Operating appropriations for 1932	Budget estimates for 1933	Amount of decrease
Department of Agriculture	$333,500,000	$215,724,000	$117,776,000

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, to supplement by a word what has been so well stated by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], I am very glad that the situation, so far as the business people down in Kentucky are concerned, is a little different from that which Senators report from other States. We have received a number of letters from business people down there, and while they want the Budget balanced and insist upon it, they also are in favor of imposing a tax. The only suggestion I have had in the main from the business people is with reference to the correction or removal of discrimination. I have had very few complaints from business men in Kentucky about the tax bill which we are now considering.

But there has gone out over the country an impression which has aroused the people more than anything I have known in many years, and that is that the entire economies which were contemplated by Congress are embraced in the so-called House economy bill. It has passed into the minds of the people that that is all we are trying to do. When the House failed, as people think, to do what it was thought it should do, then the people began to write to us that we were not doing anything about reducing Government expenses. It was not an unreasonable mistake. That bill was talked about through all the newspapers. It proposed to cut salaries and from one end of the country to the other the facts about that bill were pretty well known. But the people have not given consideration to what has been done by the House and the Senate and the Director of the Budget in making very great reductions in the appropriations for carrying on the business of the Government.

I agree with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] that the total reduction will probably reach three-quarters of a billion dollars. I think it has reached more than $500,000,000 now, taking into consideration all that has been done and comparing it with the same items for last year. There will be some new appropriations and some new expenses, but item by item there has been very much reduction, and that independent of the so-called economy bill which the people generally have in mind.

I do hope that it will be made known to the public generally that the Congress is doing the best it can to reduce expenses and that its entire program is not included in the economy bill; in fact, a very small part of the economy program is included in that bill.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, in connection with all the discussion that is taking place in the press and elsewhere today in connection with balancing the Budget, one can not refrain from pointing out that during the last 10 years there have been many propositions as to the result that was awaiting the Government, the result that was awaiting business generally in the country, if there was continued the washing away of the equities and the surpluses of a very large element of the population of America. I have heard in this Chamber during the last five or six years, and have read in the RECORD of preceding years, many warnings that if the needs of agriculture were not provided for every business in the land and the Government itself would ultimately pay the penalty by reason of it.

Living upon the farms of America is one-third of our population, approximately 30,000,000 of people. Residing in the smaller agricultural communities and business centers is another part of our population measuring nearly another third. During the past 10 or 12 years the earnings of those farm people have been whittled away a little more and a little more each and every year until finally equities and surpluses of the farm people have all but vanished, and with their disappearance there has resulted the depletion of stocks on the shelves of the merchants in the smaller towns, a depletion that is not being replenished in any degree whatever; so that the merchant now, along with the farmer, has lost his buying power.

Sixty million people are in straits that prevent them buying the things which they want, the things they need; and yet here in Congress, instead of facing facts and restoring the power that was in the hands of 60,000,000 of people, we have gone forward, and every move, I dare say, that we have made, has been a move in the interest not of those who have been oppressed but in the interest of those who have done the oppressing ever since the Great War. Even now, in this tariff controversy and in the consideration of the pending tax measure, we find at every turn of the road the interests of the selfish ones, the greedy ones, seemingly getting the first ear while the interests of the many go unanswered.

Mr. President, there has been introduced an amendment to the pending tax bill by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] which proposes to make the debenture plan available as a means of restoring in a measure the buying power of the American farmer. I mean most assuredly to give that amendment my whole-hearted support.

Another measure of great interest, which I expect may be attached to this tax bill also as an amendment, and with cause, is the one known as the Frazier bill, submitted by my colleague the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], which has been reported to the Senate by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and is now on the calendar.

Another bill has been reported to the Senate by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry which I feel would meet the present emergency in no uncertain form, and if combined with the Frazier bill would afford agriculture relief so complete and so rapid that I am sure we would all more than marvel at the results.

The newer proposal of which I speak is the plan upon which the heads of the three national farm organizations have agreed. The plan has been introduced in the form of a bill by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY]. That bill, I understand, has been ordered to be reported to the Senate to-day or will be reported to the Senate very soon. There is not a chance in the world, as I see things stacking up here now, for that bill to receive any consideration by this Congress unless it be attached to the pending tax bill; and, in view of the records that has been made during the past few days of making the tax bill a tariff measure, there can be no objection to the offering of these various agricultural proposals which, after all, as framed, aim merely at accomplishing an effective tariff for the American farmer. The so-called McNary bill is the embodiment of several plans that have been proposed to meet the needs of American agriculture. The McNary plan, which has the concurrence of the heads of all the national farm organizations, would make available to the Farm Board, or to such other agency as would administer it, any one or all of three plans in the effort to afford the farmer cost of production for his commodities and to make the tariffs on agricultural products available and effective.

One plan which would be made available is the equalization fee. Another is the debenture feature, which has been discussed time and time again in this body and in the House of Representatives. Still a third proposal which would be made available to the Farm Board in its effort to yield production cost to the farmer is an outright price-fixing measure, an outright price-fixing proposal which would make available for the farmers for that part of their product which is consumed here at home cost of production plus a reasonable profit.

I repeat that this bill, which would go far to accomplish worth-while results for agriculture, has little chance of receiving consideration at the hands of the present Congress unless it be attached to and made a part of the pending tax bill. It has a right to be attached to that bill, in view of the fact that we have written tariff proposals into the bill, and because it is the only chance which that bill seemingly has of being enacted into law. I intend to propose the amendment to the pending tax bill, which I send to the desk. The amendment is nothing more than the McNary bill, which has been authorized to be reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, at this time we are concerning ourselves with tariffs without much regard for the matter of revenue with which we ought to be dealing in considering a tax bill. The first tariff proposal was that which would fix a duty on imported oil. I opposed that duty not because I did not realize the sore and depressing situation confronting the independent oil producers of the country but because I thought I foresaw that to accept a duty on oil would be to accept the duty on lumber and on copper and on coal and perhaps on other items. So I opposed the oil proposal, because I thought that the best interests of the country would be served if we were to refrain from attaching any tariff items whatsoever to the tax bill. The Senate, however, voted the duty on oil into the bill.

We were then confronted with a proposal for a duty on coal. To this proposal I gave my support, not because I thought the situation was altogether deserving of such action but because I did want to keep myself in a position when moving agricultural tariffs in connection with this bill to point to the fact that I had not been and was not then altogether opposed to further protection for those industries which were in need. I gave it my support on that ground alone. Yet I want to give notice now that in the event there is a move made to reconsider the votes by which tariffs were written into the bill, in the case of oil and coal, I shall most assuredly vote in support of the removal of those items.

Now we are confronted, however, with the very situation which was assured when the Senate voted for a duty on oil; we are confronted now with a proposal to write a high protection for the importations of lumber into America. We are faced with that duty; we are faced with an increase in the tariff on lumber.

The only excuse offered, Mr. President, for this tariff is the temporary depression existing in the lumber industry. What is the cause of the depression which confronts that industry? It is nothing other than the thing which is responsible for the depression of every other industry in the land—a lack of buying power, not a lack of confidence on the part of Americans in the future, but an utter lack of ability to go into the marketing places and buy the things which they should like to have and, in many instances, the things which they desperately need. The producers of lumber are up against only what every other industry in the land is up against, and no tariff, I care not how high it may be, in a time such as this and in a situation such as that now confronting us is going to save or is going materially to help the lumber industry. The depression from which it suffers is nothing other than the result of the depression of every other industry in the country, and more notably the agricultural industry.

The American farmer, Mr. President, directly and indirectly, consumes 46 per cent of the lumber produced and sold in America. Without the power on the part of the agriculturists to buy lumber the result is inevitable—depression in the lumber industry. The farmers of the United States are feeling the depression, however, far worse and far more severely than is any other industry in the land. Just to show how completely the buying power of the farmer has vanished, let me say that the American grain farmer received only 50 per cent as much for the products which he sold in September, 1931, as he would have received for the same products 20 years ago, between 1909 and 1914. The figures are in accordance with the statistics published by the National Timber Conservation Board. At the same time, in September, 1931, the farmer was forced to pay 27 per cent more for the things he bought than he would have had to pay for those same things 20 years previously. In other words, the purchasing power of the grain farmer of America in September, 1931, in terms of commodities produced, was only 39 per cent of what it was 20 years ago. It is no wonder, then, Mr. President, that as the buyers of almost half of the lumber consumed in the United States they have had materially to curtail their purchases of lumber. When the farmer's purchasing power has been reduced, industries dependent upon him for their market must, of necessity, suffer in consequence.

While this is the general picture, the situation in my State is considerably worse. The cash income, for example, of the North Dakota farmer for the year 1931–32 was only 40 per cent of his average cash income for the last five years. It can not and must not be maintained that the last five years have afforded a fair average of income for the farmer, for his income for the last five years has been extremely low. His purchasing power, other than for the absolute essentials of life, is almost, if not completely, a minus quantity. He has no money with which to buy lumber or anything else. The cure for the depressed condition of the lumber industry is the restoration of the purchasing power of the consumers of lumber. Give the farmer an opportunity to buy and the lumber industry will be automatically revived. Increase the price of lumber by the imposition of tariff duties and it will be impossible for the farmer to buy, and the industry will not be benefited one iota.

One of the Representatives in Congress from the State of Washington, seeking a tariff on lumber, a little more than a week ago said that he felt the tariff would do very little, if anything, to remedy the condition of the lumber industry.

After the passage of the tariff act of 1930, in which a duty of $1 per thousand feet was imposed upon lumber, the Senate called upon the Tariff Commission, through Senate resolutions 313 and 321, to make a thorough investigation of the foreign and domestic cost of producing lumber.

In response to these resolutions the Tariff Commission made such an investigation. The investigation by the commission was very exhaustive, lasting some 16 months, and costing some $27,000. Last November 9, 1931, the Tariff Commission issued a report on its findings. They recommended to the President that the duty on lumber should not be changed. The report concludes in these words:

> The commission finds that the facts with regard to the difference in costs of production, including transportation to the principal markets in the United States, of the domestic article and the like or similar foreign article produced in the principal competing country, as disclosed by the investigation herein reported, covering the year 1929, do not warrant a change in the duty of $1 per thousand feet board measure, expressly fixed by statute on timber hewn, sided, or squared, otherwise than by sawing, and round timber used for spars or in building wharves; sawed lumber and timber not specially provided for; all the foregoing, if of fir, spruce, pine, hemlock, or larch.

The President of the United States approved this report on December 2, 1931, only five months ago. Therefore, we can only include that upon the basis of actual conditions there is no justification at this time for any change in the duty on lumber.

The contention that depreciation of Canadian currency has given Canadian lumber manufacturers a cost advantage can not be properly considered here, in view of the fact that the full information on this subject is now being obtained by the House Ways and Means Committee. The whole question is being made a matter of separate legislation.

Without going into the costs of production and transportation in detail, it may be pointed out that the commission found that the existing duty was from 20 cents to 57 cents more than sufficient to equalize the domestic and Canadian cost of producing Douglas fir lumber, the principal species on which tariff arguments have heretofore been chiefly based. In this connection, I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD and made a part of my remarks a table revealing the facts and figures with relation to the Tariff Commission's report to the President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Foreign and domestic cost of producing lumber

[Tariff Commission report to President Hoover, Nov. 9, 1931]

	Cost delivered at New York			Cost delivered at Chicago
	At mill	Transportation	Total	At mill	Transportation	Total
Douglas fir:
Domestic costs	$22.96	$10.45	$33.41	$22.96	$17.28	$40.24
Canadian costs	22.50	10.11	32.61	22.50	17.31	39.81
Excess of domestic costs			.80			.43
Northern pine:
Domestic costs	37.09	9.25	47.24	37.61	3.63	41.24
Canadian costs	37.35	7.78	45.13	37.35	6.55	43.90
Excess of domestic costs			2.11			[1] 2.66
Eastern spruce:
Domestic costs	33.82	7.51	41.33	33.82	10.29	44.11
Canadian costs	32.24	7.98	40.22	32.24	10.60	42.84
Excess of domestic costs			1.11			1.27

[1] Excess of Canadian over domestic costs.

NOTE.—Existing duty of $1 per thousand board feet should be subtracted from "excess of domestic costs."

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. NYE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. STEIWER. Does the table disclose that the figures employed in the report are made upon the basis of business for the year 1929?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the table which I have asked to have included is known as table No. 21 appearing with the report made by the Tariff Commission to the President. It reveals the cost of lumber delivered at New York and at Chicago, showing the mill price and the transportation cost and the total cost.

Mr. STEIWER. But does it disclose that it was made for the year 1929?

Mr. NYE. I am quite unprepared to answer definitely the Senator's question; but I assume that the report that was made in 1930, as of the situation existing in the lumber industry at the time the commission's investigation was being made, would cover 1929 as the last year for which available facts would be known.

Mr. STEIWER. I think that is correct. I am glad to have the Senator make that statement, because otherwise it might be assumed that the report of the Tariff Commission was made upon facts and conditions current at this time.

Mr. NYE. No; it could not have been that, of course, Mr. President, because the report was received and acted upon by the President five or six months ago.

The commission would have been justified in decreasing the duty. Certainly there was not and is not now any case for an increase.

If the Senate is not willing to accept the conclusions of the Tariff Commission on these matters, why should we continue to have a Tariff Commission? Senators asking for a tariff on oil predicated their plea for such a tariff on the findings of the United States Tariff Commission as to the foreign and domestic costs of production of oil. In its investigation on this subject, the Tariff Commission found that foreign oil producers had a material cost advantage; and many Senators followed the conclusions of the Tariff Commission in this matter. Will the same Senators now follow the conclusions of the Tariff Commission with respect to lumber?

There are many reasons, in addition to the findings of the Tariff Commission, why there should be no duty on lumber. We export twice as much lumber as we import. If we drive Canadian lumber out of the American market, there can be no question that this Canadian lumber will offer sterner competition in foreign markets. This would be particularly disastrous at this time, when the United States is so sadly dependent upon every possible outlet to foreign markets.

In connection with any discussion of the forest situation existing in the United States at this time, the special report of the Timber Conservation Board is deserving of consideration. I ask that the board's table revealing the situation as to production, imports, and exports for the years starting with 1923 and ending with 1929 may be made a part of the RECORD at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

THE FOREST SITUATION IN THE UNITED STATES

United States lumber production, imports and exports, 1923–1929

From a special report to the Timber Conservation Board, as prepared by the U. S. Department of Agriculture, Jan. 30, 1932.

Mr. NYE. In addition, I have before me three tables, one showing the percentage of cargo shipments of lumber entering the domestic market coming from western Canada, the second indicating the percentage of lumber shipped to foreign markets from western Canada, and the third showing the percentage shipped to all markets from western Canada. I may state for the sake of the record that these tables are taken from the Pacific Lumber Inspection Bureau statistics, and I ask that they may be made a part of the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The tables are as follows:

Mr. NYE. These tables show that as the western Canadian water-borne shipments to the United States were partially excluded from the domestic markets by the tariff imposed in 1930, water-borne shipments from western Canada to foreign markets increased in almost exactly the same proportion, and the proportion of net water-borne shipments to all markets from western Canada remained unchanged. Western Canada in 1929 furnished 11½ per cent of the total water-borne shipments from the Pacific coast to domestic markets. In 1931, the first full year after the imposition of the tariff, western Canada shipped only 9 per cent of the lumber entering the same markets. (Water-borne shipments, Pacific Lumber Inspection Bureau figures.) The proportion of western Canada shipments to foreign markets in the same period increased from 20 per cent to 28 per cent. But the total shipments to all markets from western Canada were 14½ per cent of the total in 1929 and 15½ per cent of the total in 1931. There is no profit to the domestic lumber industry in shutting Canadian lumber out of the domestic market and losing the valuable export markets which take the better grades of lumber selling at higher prices.

The fact that domestic lumber manufacturers on the Pacific coast have been able to compete with Canadian west coast lumber manufacturers in every market in the world tells the story of comparative production cost. The production of lumber in Washington and Oregon is four times as large as the production in western Canada; yet Washington and Oregon manufacturers have always been able to sell more than six times as much lumber as western Canadian manufacturers in foreign or domestic markets. If, as has been alleged, the Canadian manufacturer has cost advantages, he could and would have enjoyed a larger share of the market than one-sixth when his production is one-fourth as great. In many markets the Canadian shipper is practically excluded. This is particularly true of Continental European markets, to which Washington and Oregon last year shipped fifty times as much as British Columbia, and South America, to which Washington and Oregon last year shipped thirty-four times as much as British Columbia. In the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands Washington and Oregon enjoyed an exclusive market. British Columbia was not able to ship a single board into these markets.

Let us take a look at the amounts of lumber Washington and Oregon actually shipped to these markets in which Canadian shippers had so small a part.

	Board feet
To Europe:
Washington and Oregon shipped in 1931	73,049,000
British Columbia shipped	1,534,000
To South America:
Washington and Oregon shipped in 1931	45,607,000
British Columbia shipped	1,354,000
To the Philippine Islands:
Washington and Oregon shipped in 1931	2,121,000
British Columbia shipped	None.
To Hawaii:
Washington and Oregon shipped in 1931	56,096,000
British Columbia shipped	None.
To Australia:
Washington and Oregon shipped in 1931	26,724,000
British Columbia shipped	50,803,000

The entire Australian market, about which so much has been said in the matter of preferential tariff rates, took almost exactly the same amount of lumber as Continental European markets. Washington and Oregon, in spite of preferential tariffs, were able to ship to Australia seventeen times as much actual lumber as Canada was able to ship to Europe. If western Canada lumber manufacturers have all the advantages alleged in the matter of cost of production and transportation, it seems to me they would not be excluded from these markets.

One of the arguments advanced as a reason for a tariff on Canadian lumber is the preferential tariff agreements between Canada and Australia and the United Kingdom, which it is alleged shut the domestic exporter out of the Australian and English markets.

These preferential agreements were made subsequent to the enactment of our tariff act in 1930, which to a material extent shut Canadian lumber out of our Atlantic-coast markets. The Canadian lumber that was displaced from the American market went to the Australian market. Positive evidence of this is found in the fact that British Columbia's share of waterborne shipments to the American domestic markets declined from 11½ per cent in 1929 and 1930 to 9 per cent in 1931, while at the same time British Columbia's share in the shipments to all markets, foreign and domestic, remained practically stationary, dropping only from slightly over 16 per cent to slightly under 16 per cent.

The United States has driven Canada to seek trade preferences in foreign markets; and if this proposed additional tariff on lumber is enacted, we will find Canada seeking further preferential agreements. The expansion of Canadian lumber exports in the foreign markets will have the twofold effect of displacing an equal amount of American lumber in those markets and of diverting a portion of Canadian purchases, now made in the United States, to the nations to which Canada is able to export its surplus commodities.

Canada is not alone in having preferential tariff rates on its lumber in foreign markets. The United States has very decided preferential rates in exporting lumber to Germany. The German tariff on rough Douglas fir, pine, and spruce lumber from the United States is 6 reichsmarks per cubic meter, while the duty against similar lumber from Canada is 30 reichsmarks per cubic meter, or five times as much. Cuba charges 60 cents per 100 kilos on lumber, planed or tongued and grooved, from the United States, while Canadian lumber of the same type must pay 75 cents.

I have here a table showing the waterborne shipments of lumber from the Pacific Northwest to all markets. These figures include foreign exports as well as shipments to domestic markets, originating in Washington, Oregon, and British Columbia. The table covers the period of 9 years from 1923 to 1931, inclusive. British Columbia has never obtained more than 16¼ per cent of the total shipments. Washington and Oregon have always retained more than 84 per cent of the trade in all the markets to which Pacific-coast lumber is shipped.

I ask to have this table incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Water borne shipments of lumber from the Pacific Northwest to all markets

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the imports of lumber at which this duty of $3 per thousand is aimed amount to only 5 per cent of domestic consumption. This relationship between consumption and imports has remained constant in the last several years. If this entire 5 per cent were excluded from American markets, it would mean an increase of 1½ per cent of normal-capacity operation in the lumber industry, even though there were no curtailment in exports.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I assume there are planing mills in the Senator's State?

Mr. NYE. No, Mr. President; there are no planing mills in North Dakota.

Mr. COPELAND. None in the northern part of the State at all?

Mr. NYE. No.

Mr. COPELAND. This is the matter I want to call to the attention of the Senator. The proposed tariff covers rough lumber as well as planed lumber.

Mr. NYE. So I understand.

Mr. COPELAND. It will make a vast difference in the employment of labor in my State if rough lumber can not be brought into New York State free of duty. It will mean that there will be the same rate of duty upon the rough lumber as is levied upon planed lumber. So the proposal means much to our mills, because the rough lumber is brought in from Canada to the planing mills in northern New York, and is there converted into planed and finished lumber. Of course, the tariff of $3 a thousand on rough lumber would mean a decrease in employment in my State to the extent of thousands of laborers.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit, I should like to ask him what percentage of the entire lumber handled in these planing mills in his State comes from Canada?

Mr. COPELAND. I would say it is a very large percentage, more than half.

Mr. NYE. The greater portion comes from Canada?

Mr. COPELAND. The greater portion; yes. So it would mean a decline in employment, and a material increase in the basic cost of finished lumber.

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator for his remarks.

COST OF THE PROPOSED LUMBER TARIFF

If the proposed tariff on lumber is effective, it will increase the price of every foot of lumber consumed in the United States. If the tariff is not to be effective, it should not be enacted. This increased price will be more than the amount of the tariff. Through pyramiding, it is estimated that the increase in price will be at least 40 per cent more than the tariff rate. If the additional rate of $3 per thousand feet contained in the revenue bill is enacted, it will mean that the American farmer, normally consuming 10,000,000,000 feet of lumber annually for construction, will be taxed $50,000,000 a year by this iniquitous proposal. The farmer can not pay this tax. He will have to continue to forego the much-needed new house or barn. Farm lumber consumption at the present time is down to only 55 per cent of normal, indicating what we all know to be true, namely, that the farmer is not able to earn the sort of income that would enable him to keep in repair such home and barn as he now has. If present conditions continue, or the price of lumber is increased, the farmer's consumption of lumber will fall even lower, with even more disastrous effect on the lumber industry. The real hope of the American lumber industry lies not in the exclusion of the small amount of lumber which we import but lies rather in the restoration of prosperity to America.

DEPLETION

The subject of timber depletion, indicated by charts the senior Senator from Minnesota has offered and has upon the walls of the Senate, is intimately related to the question of a tariff. Although there is ample testimony showing that there would be no economic justification for a lumber tariff, even if Canadian cost of production were lower, public policy, in the interest of forest conservation, would demand free lumber.

In discussing the proposed lumber tariff in 1930, I made the statement that at the then rate of consumption and loss by fire and insects our present merchantable forest areas would be depleted in approximately 60 years.

Although my statement at that time was based on figures nearly 10 years old, which were part of the so-called Capper report of 1920 (report on S. Res. 311, 1920), and the report of the Senator McNary select committee on reforestation in 1924, in January of 1932, just four months ago, the United States Forest Service gave up-to-date information in a special report to the Timber Conservation Board. That report shows that our supply of saw timber is being cut for lumber and other uses, and being destroyed by fire, disease, insects, drought, and wind at the rate of 59,000,000,000 board feet per year, or at six times the rate of growth of this type of material. Regrowth of this saw timber is taking place at the rate of 9,700,000,000 board feet per year, leaving a net depletion of approximately 49,000,000,000 board feet per year. As the total saw timber remaining in the United States is only 1,668,000,000,000 feet, it can be seen that our total timber supply is sufficient for only 34 years at the present rate of consumption. This is taken from the latest and most complete data available.

In the face of this appalling situation it is here proposed to stimulate the cutting of our small remaining timber supply and hasten the day of total exhaustion of our timber resources.

NORTHERN WHITE PINE

From Canada we import virgin northern white-pine lumber. This is the species which was once so plentiful throughout New England, New York, Pennsylvania, and the States around the Great Lakes. At one time we cut as much as 8,000,000,000 feet of this species of lumber in one year in the United States. The United States now has left a total remaining supply of only 4,000,000,000 feet of virgin timber of this species, according to the report of the Tariff Commission on lumber, page 27.

Estimates by the Forest Service of the stand of white-pine timber

[Figures are broken down to separate Norway pine]

Region	Virgin timber	Second growth
New England	2,507,000,000	5,883,000,000
Middle Atlantic	4,000,000	3,526,000,000
South Atlantic and Central	155,000,000	165,000,000
Lake States	1,212,000,000	161,000,000
Total	3,878,000,000	9,735,000,000

Source: U. S. Tariff Commission report on lumber, p. 27.

There has been ample evidence presented clearly to prove that this species of lumber is now being used for purposes in which it is indispensable. For example, the navy yard here in Washington uses large quantities of this type of lumber to make foundry patterns for the casting of ordnance parts. They have in storage at the navy yard more than 300,000 patterns made of this virgin northern white pine. For the purpose of pattern making, as for various other purposes, no other species of softwood lumber can be used. The cost of the material for the manufacture of patterns is only a small part of the total cost. Frequently as much as a hundred times the value of the wood used is spent for labor in designing the pattern. After it is completed the pattern must hold its shape. It must not warp, or twist, or check, or swell, or lose its shape, or it becomes valueless. Virgin northern white pine is the only softwood species that fulfills these very exacting requirements. We must have virgin northern white pine, and our domestic forests are no longer able to supply a sufficient quantity in the grades and sizes demanded. It is not a question of importation displacing American domestic production; it is a question of supplying an indispensable raw material to American industry. A tax upon the importation of virgin northern white pine is a tax upon depressed American industries which can ill afford to bear any further burdens.

The cost of production of this lumber in Canada is no less than the domestic cost. In fact, in determining the cost of production, including transportation to Chicago and surrounding territory, which is the principal market for this type of lumber, the Tariff Commission found that the domestic cost of production was $2.66 per thousand board feet less than the cost of production in Canada. What possible excuse can there be for ignoring the findings of the Tariff Commission, established for the purpose of taking the tariff out of politics, and imposing a duty upon an essential raw material, not justified on the basis of cost of production or any other reasonable basis of tariff adjustment?

As the once immense supply of virgin northern white pine became depleted and the prices increased, we were forced to turn to distant fields for lumber for general construction purposes. In Washington and Oregon was found a tremendous supply of Douglas fir, a species ideally suited to such uses. The trees were immense, and the two States were practically covered with a beautiful stand of that timber. As demands for this lumber have increased, production has kept pace, and the forests are being demolished at a rapid rate. I have here a statement prepared by Norman Porteous, a forest engineer of Seattle, Wash., showing the acreage in western Washington which has been logged since 1919.

NOTE.—These figures are an impartial story of the true timber situation in western Washington. The amount of lands timbered, outside of the national forests, was arrived at by taking lands assessed as timberlands and then checking these areas in the field. The Forest Service claims 60,000,000,000 feet for the national forests. This would give eight years additional life to the industry on the present rate of production. However, 60 per cent of the timber in the national forests is pulpwood. The cut-over areas have been compiled from actual logging operations and recapitulations made each year. This is the only authentic compilation in existence and represents a vast amount of detail work each year.

PORTEOUS & CO., Forest Engineers.
By NORMAN PORTEOUS.

SEATTLE, WASH., June 15, 1931.

Every year from 100,000 to 150,000 acres of this wonderful timber are destroyed. There is now left but slightly over 2,000,000 acres of this timber in western Washington, less than enough for 15 years at the present rate of destruction. Yet we are here faced with a proposal to hasten this destruction by placing an embargo upon the small amount of lumber which is imported. Who is to pay for this destruction? As a result of this proposed tariff the American people will, without giving consideration to the pyramiding of the tariff, pay $4 per thousand board feet more for the lumber they buy. Then when the forests are gone the Congress will be called upon to appropriate immense sums for reforestation. We have already spent large sums for this purpose. It has been estimated that we have spent a total of a billion dollars on reforestation and forest protection.

Now we are faced with a proposal which will hasten depletion of the one remaining large stand of timber in the United States at the expense of the American people and for the doubtful benefit of a few large timber owners who wish to liquidate their investments.

About 40 per cent of our lumber imports is spruce lumber, a species once plentiful in the New England States. As far as spruce-lumber manufacture is concerned, the New England States are no longer a large factor in production. What little timber has not been cut has been segregated to the uses of the pulp and paper industry, for which this species is particularly well adapted.

Spruce lumber is a special-purpose wood, because of its long fiber and its consequent great tensile strength. It is the only wood which can be used in the manufacture of airplanes and in the building of certain types of scaffolding. An example of the special qualifications of spruce for scaffolding is the fact that spruce is considered the only safe wood in large chemical plants for use in the scaffolding over the chemical vats.

In the manufacture of commercial refrigeration, butter tubs, and other food-container industries spruce is used almost exclusively because of its lack of odor and lack of odor absorption.

In the manufacture of fine musical instruments spruce is the only lumber that can be used to obtain the best resonance qualities.

For these and many other uses spruce lumber is indispensable. It is not a question of substitution of other species of lumber. If the spruce is not available, alternate materials must be used in most cases. The domestic lumber industry will not benefit from the exclusion of importations of this material. The exclusion of spruce will mean diminution in the consumption of lumber in the United States. Our remaining supply of spruce timber is far from being sufficient to supply the demands of the pulp and paper industry. Even for this purpose it is necessary that we import a large share of our consumption. Practically the only spruce manufactured in New England any more is from selected logs cut in the course of pulpwood logging operations. A few logs which are ideally suited to lumber manufacture, and much more valuable for that purpose, are diverted to the sawmill rather than the pulp mill.

The lumber industry of the United States will get no benefit from depriving American consumers of raw materials that they need.

Any tariff on this lumber must necessarily fall directly upon the consumer to the full extent of the tariff, and in addition, will be pyramided in the usual manner of tariffs to probably 40 per cent more than the tariff itself. The proposed rate, when added to the present tariff on lumber, will mean a cost to the consumer of at least $5 per thousand board feet, with no benefit to anyone.

I have here a table showing the remaining stand of spruce timber, which I ask to insert at this point without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Estimates by the United States Forest Service of the stand of spruce timber

[Tariff Commission Report on Lumber, Report 32, November 9, 1931]

Region	Old growth	Second growth
	Board feet	Board feet
New England	13,074,000,000	5,646,000,000
Middle Atlantic		1,564,000,000
South Atlantic and Central	406,000,000
Lake States	761,000,000	82,000,000
Total	14,241,000,000	7,292,000,000

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, it seems to me that one of the things with which we need to be most concerned in connection with the proposed duty on lumber is our neighbor to the north, Canada. It has been quite generally overlooked in connection with the lumber tariff that we export some lumber to Canada. If we compare the interchange on the basis of population, we find that each Canadian citizen buys four times as much of American wood and wood products as American citizens buy of Canadian wood and wood products. The United States Tariff Commission in its report on lumber, at page 7, shows that our softwood lumber exports to Canada in 1925 were 51,000,000 board feet, and by 1929 they had increased to 113,446,000 feet, more than twice as much. At the same time our softwood imports from Canada declined from 1,700,000,000 feet in 1925 to 1,000,000,000 feet in 1929. Since 1929 both exports and imports have declined due to the depression, and yet the same ratio will obtain without question.

TRADE WITH CANADA

We exported to Canada in the depressed markets of 1931, $393,775,829 worth of commodities, as compared to imports from Canada whose value was only $257,078,170. The balance of trade in our favor was more than $135,000,000. The United States has had a consistently favorable balance of trade with Canada for many years. In addition to the obvious monetary value of this balance of trade, there is the additional fact that our exports to Canada were largely manufactured products, while our imports were almost entirely raw materials. In other words, the value represented by our exports is comprised largely of labor costs, whereas our imports value represent raw material upon which American labor will be expended in producing finished products.

At this point I should like to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a table showing the interchange of trade between the United States and Canada in 1931.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Interchange of trade between the United States and Canada, 1931

Groups of commodities	Exports to Canada from United States	Imports from Canada
Agricultural and vegetable products	$48,476,700	$12,210,232

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, in concluding, I should like to remark that there is perhaps no one issue, aside, of course, from the issue of what we might have done to afford to the American farmer the cost of production for his products, than that issue which would bring the advantages of the waterways from the ocean to the Great Lakes to the great territory in the great Northwest around the Great Lakes. Yet, from what we are reading and hearing, I venture to assert that Canada might be at a point where she is not willing to accept much more of this. It may appear to them to be something in the form of insult for us to come back year after year and levy more and more against them through our tariffs and our walls that we build up against free interchange in business with that country. I am wondering how seriously we are going to jeopardize the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway project by moving forward at this particular time and proposing an indefensible duty upon this lumber, upon this item that means so much to our neighbors. It occurs to me that if nothing else should move us into opposition to this proposed duty on lumber now, the cause and the necessity of that Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway project ought to do it.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, we are considering one of the most drastic tax bills ever imposed upon the people of the United States in peace times. The excuse is the deficit besetting the Treasury, the necessity of balancing the Budget. But we have refused, in taxing those still enjoying great incomes, to impose even the rates of taxation adopted in 1922. As a further example of the general attitude, the Finance Committee has refused to recommend that we specially tax such a highly prosperous activity as the power industry, whose banner years were 1930 and 1931—both ahead of the boom year of 1929.

Yet, Mr. President, the committee did recommend a tax on orders which the farmer draws and cashes when he delivers his cream to the agency transporting it to the creamery—a tax that last month in my State would have amounted to about 13⅓ per cent of the farmer's profit on his butterfat. It may be said this is a trifling matter. It is not trifling, Mr. President, to a farmer in Nebraska with an investment, for example, in eight cows, which he must feed, care for, milk, separate the cream, and deliver it to some carrier or station for a gross income of $1.20 per day. That was the record last month, reported by the Dairy Herd Improvement Association of Nebraska.

Let me repeat, the farmer to-day must deliver two wagonloads of his products to purchase that which one wagonload would buy in the 1909–1914 period. What has this Congress done to remedy this situation? Nothing. But what are we doing in the pending tax or revenue bill? Advantage is being taken of the opportunity to load it down with tariff items, not for revenue, not germane in any way, but disadvantageous to the farmer. Something to make him pay more, not less. Already we have provided a tariff on oil which, at least, will afford an excuse for increasing the cost of gasoline. And now it is proposed to do the same for lumber. Both the industries affected have been highly prosperous until recently.

But the farmer, Mr. President? His industry has been in the trough of depression for the past 12 years. Last year the differential against him, so far as equality with other industries was concerned, was 38 per cent—a differential of 38 per cent against him! Surely, as the Bible says, in effect, to him who hath shall be given, but to him who hath not even that which he hath shall be taken away. We seem to have no thought for the farmer. But we have had thought for Europe.

During this session we relieved Europe of paying us $247,000,000 this year. Of course, if we had not done this, we might have been able to spare the farmer's milk checks in this tax bill. Mr. President, if Europe had shouldered merely the interest burden of her debts to us, we would not necessarily have had a Treasury deficit at this time and, hence, so drastic a tax bill as this one now before us.

Why, Mr. President, since the dates of settlement of these various European debts—about eight years back as an average—we will have paid by next July in interest on an equal amount of our bonds outstanding and properly representing those debts $2,369,000,000 more than the total payments made by these debtor nations of every kind and nature. There is the Treasury deficit.

Mr. President, agriculture must be rescued, but by such legislative provisions Congress proposes to increase agriculture's burdens. When are we to act for the benefit of agriculture? Agriculture must be rescued.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate again to-day, as I did last Friday when debating the tariff on oil, to the fact that in the tax bill where tariff items are injected, the Finance Committee did not bring in any tariff on agricultural products. Again I call attention to the fact that Senators in 1928 voted against tariff items on a tax bill because they said it was improper. Again I call attention to the fact that the press called that effort of injecting a tariff amendment upon a tax bill "a conspiracy," an act that was intended to defeat the tax bill. So we find that a conspiracy in 1928 becomes the doctrine of salvation in 1932, but that doctrine of salvation, however erroneous I may hold it to be, the proponents of that doctrine of salvation have so far refused to spread out freely among all the people. They want what they think is salvation at the expense of all consumers of copper, oil, coal, and lumber.

I wish to say again that if this tax bill is to be made a tariff bill, I shall have to offer amendments so that the great agricultural interests of the United States, which will be taxed for the benefit of the industries now included in the bill, may get a few cents back out of whatever tax is collected through this tax bill from them. I have always felt, so far as agriculture is concerned, that it has always been swindled under the tariff. For every cent the farmer gets out of the tariff I have always thought he paid entirely too much.

Mr. President, I now desire to call attention to the charts on the wall to show the rapid depletion of the supply of lumber in the United States in comparison with the growth of our timber. That great natural resource on which our entire supply of lumber is dependent is fast disappearing. Here [indicating on chart] is shown the growth and the production of timber in the United States and the depletion of our timber supply. The chart shows that our timber supply is decreasing at the rate of 59,000,000,000 board feet a year, while the growth of timber is only at the rate of nine and three-quarters billion feet a year. So the timber supply is disappearing at the rate of approximately 50,000,000,000 board feet a year faster than timber is being grown.

Here on this chart [indicating] we have the production of lumber. It is shown that the production of lumber is now 36,000,000,000 board feet a year. The difference in the production of lumber and the depletion of timber, therefore, can be shown to consist of the articles embraced in the following table, excluding the first item of lumber, amounting to 38,000,000,000 feet.

The items listed, excluding lumber, make up the difference of about 20,000,000,000 board feet between the production of lumber and the depletion of the timber supply.

This chart [indicating] also shows the amount of exports and the amount of imports. In round numbers we approximately export about twice as much as we import.

I call the charts and the figures to the attention of the Senate, because they afford a graphic view of a vast disappearing natural resource in timber. So there is something involved in the pending question that has to do with the conservation of this great natural resource. Of course, the lumber industry is in a very bad state, and so, to the best of my knowledge, is every other industry in the United States.

We hear a great deal about the decline in exports of lumber, and, of course, lumber exports have fallen off. We also hear a great deal more about the flooding imports from Canada, but Canadian exports of lumber have kept pace exactly with the exports of lumber from the United States.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I should like to have the Senator explain the chart. In one case there is shown a depletion of 59,000,000,000 feet and the other a production of 36,000,000,000 feet. Is it estimated that the lumber foot is the same as the tree foot?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The charts give the figures in board feet.

Mr. FESS. So that the production would be 36,000,000,000 feet while the depletion would be 59,000,000,000 feet?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Was the Senator here when I explained what made up the difference between 36,000,000,000 feet and 59,000,000,000 feet?

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The lumber products are such things as boards, studdings, 6 by 6's, and so forth. The difference between 36,000,000,000 feet of lumber production and the 59,000,000,000 feet of timber cut is made up of fuel wood—I will not again go through all the items, but it includes ties and fence posts, pulpwood, hewn timber, veneer logs, staves, and so forth.

Mr. FESS. That explains what I had in mind. The production of lumber is 36,000,000,000 feet and the depletion of timber is 59,000,000,000 feet. What I wanted was an explanation of this additional depletion above the production. I think I understand it now.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, certainly no one here in the Senate would have any lack of sympathy for any industry; but, as I have already said, every industry is in trouble.

Mr. President, on November 17, 1931, the Tariff Commission submitted a report on the question of need for an increased tariff on lumber. That report was indorsed by the President of the United States on December 2, 1931. From that report I quote in part:

> The commission finds that the facts with regard to the difference in the cost of production, including transportation to the principal markets of the United States, do not warrant a change in the duty of $1 per thousand feet board measure expressly fixed by statute.

I beg Senators to remember that that report was filed after a careful investigation by the Tariff Commission.

I remember very well the controversy that took place here in the Senate as to whether or not under the flexible tariff provision the Tariff Commission should report its findings for action to Congress or to the President. I have always been in favor of having the Tariff Commission, since such a commission has been created, report to Congress, as I have always thought that the Bureau of the Budget ought to report to Congress. When Congress delegated the authority to the Executive to control the purse, I think Congress delegated a power that it itself should have retained under the authority granted to it by the Constitution. It is true that there is no obligation upon the part of Congress to respect the recommendations of the Budget submitted to us by the Chief Executive, but those recommendations have great influence. For instance, I can imagine that if Congress had had control of the Budget, and if the Budget had reported to Congress instead of the President, the Appropriations Committees of the two Houses would have been working with the Budget Bureau last summer in an effort to provide a Budget that would have taken care of all the items that are now talked about under the guise of economy.

The Budget Bureau being under the control of the Chief Executive, he submits its report in a message to the Congress, in which he says, "Here is the money I need to run the executive department of the Government." This year after the Budget had thus been presented to the Congress we have had the spectacle of the Chief Executive writing messages to Congress asking for reductions; and every message that has come to the Congress on that subject is a declaration to the world that either the Bureau of the Budget or those in control of the Budget did not know what they were doing when they prepared the Budget for the coming fiscal year.

The place to effect economies is in the preparation of the Budget. I am not opposed to inaugurating economies now wherever that can be done, but the businesslike method, the scientific method of bringing about economies is, when various departments and the heads of the departments make their requests to the Budget Bureau, to compel them to justify their requests. That is the time to pare expenditures.

However, the Tariff Commission reported to the President on the question of increasing the tariff on lumber and found that an increase was not justified. I am not going to read the names of the Senators who voted for the flexible tariff provision and also voted to require the reports of the Tariff Commission to be submitted to the President rather than to Congress; I do not care to do that, but I want to remind Senators who stood here and fought day after day to have the Tariff Commission report to the President instead of to Congress that they are now throwing the report of the Tariff Commission and of the President out of the window, ignoring and disregarding the child of their own creation.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Upon that point, if the flexible provisions were far-reaching enough so that the President's decision would be final, we would avoid the situation which now confronts us and which I think is wholly inconsistent in that we have before us a tax bill and are now discussing tariffs. That is the result of not having any finality about the action of the Tariff Commission.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator refer to the injection of tariff items in the tax bill.

Mr. FESS. Yes; I was referring to that.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I agree with the Senator, though I am not sure that I absolutely agree that it is improper at any time to inject tariff measures into a tax bill. I have objected and protested against putting tariff measures into this bill principally—whether the purpose is to raise or lower tariff duties—on the ground of the delay in the passage of the tax bill and the danger of keeping Congress in session all summer. Does the Senator think for a moment that the country is going to tolerate or sustain the proposition that as to four of the large interests of this country, organized to a large extent in monopolistic form, an act of Congress shall make it possible for them to collect additional sums from 120,000,000 people whose income is gradually being dissipated and gradually being reduced? If the country would tolerate it, and if the Congress puts its stamp of approval upon that kind of a measure, I believe these industries would find a grave disappointment in the results, because the business condition of this country, the unemployment of this country, the disappearing purchasing power of this country, certainly are not due to a great influx of products from abroad. Certainly no one can defend an assertion of that kind. We are suffering here from entirely different active economic forces that have come to a climax as a result of a multiplication of policies that we have pursued that have brought us to where we are now. So far as the depression is concerned, I do not believe that these industries will be benefited by these tariffs, because the foundation of the economic life of the Nation is going to pieces. We can not hold it together by tinkering with tariffs.

It has been said that this debate costs the Government of the United States $2,000,000 a day. I want to lay the responsibility for whatever delay there is here upon the shoulders of those who have been insisting on placing tariff schedules in this tax bill.

I desire to read an editorial from a British Columbia paper—the Canadian Press—showing the possibilities of further retaliation on the part of the Canadian Government against our products if we persist in the policies we have pursued since 1919. I beg you to remember that Canada was our best customer. She bought more goods from us than any other country in the world. Here is an editorial of May 8:

VICTORIA, May 8.—Possibility that British Columbia would seek retaliatory tariff measures if the United States imposed prohibitive duties on coal, copper, and lumber imports was seen here yesterday when Attorney General R. H. Pooley, acting premier, intimated such a program was under consideration.

The proposed tariffs before the United States Congress include a $3 per thousand feet impost on lumber, and duties on coal and copper which would make export of these commodities from Canada to the United States almost impossible.

If these tariff increases go into effect, Acting Premier Pooley intimated, British Columbia would ask the Dominion Government to impose an export duty on nickel and asbestos—two commodities which the United States must import—and an import duty of $5 per ton on all coal entering Canada.

We have been exporting about 15,000,000 tons of coal to Canada every year—very much more than Canada sends to us; I think about ten times more than she sends to us.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do.

Mr. KING. The Senator is a little in error. The imports from Canada have not exceeded 172,000 tons per annum, while our exports to Canada have been from ten to sixteen million tons. A $5 tariff upon our exports will, of course, close the markets to our coal, and scores of bituminous mines will be shut down, and thousands of American miners will be thrown out of employment. So that because of an import of one hundred and sixty to one hundred and seventy thousand tons of coal from Canada we are going to lose a 16,000,000-ton market, and we are going also to lost our market for export of oil, which has amounted to many tens of millions of dollars annually, and we are going to lose our market for our citrus fruits.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thank the Senator.

I continue reading from this editorial:

In addition, the British Columbia government, acting within its own jurisdiction, would probably impose an individual inspection fee on all citrus fruits, apples, and vegetables imported into the Province.

Mr. Pooley said British Columbia has been a large importer of United States crude oil, fruits, and to some extent vegetables, while the country to the scuth imports its raw nickel and asbestos to a large extent from Canada.

Another commodity upon which recommendation may be made to Ottawa is crude petroleum. Canada imported, according to the 1930 figures, petroleum valued at $35,861,000 and gasoline worth $18,868,000.

Crude oil is the chief competitor of British Columbia coal in its home market. The suggestion has been advanced that, in the event of embargo being placed on Canadian coal, the Dominion apply a general tariff that would effectually shut out the United States products and enter into "favored nations" treaty arrangements with South American countries producing crude petroleum.

Premier S. E. Tolmie has gone to Ottawa, and any representations necessary will be made through him direct to the Dominion Government, with a request that action be taken by the Federal Parliament this present session.

Mr. President, when the debate was on here about an import tariff on coal and oil to protect the American laborer and the American coal miner I was reminded of a conversation I had with a very distinguished Member of the body at the other end of the Capitol, the House of Representatives, who last summer made a very extensive study of the coal industry and labor in the coal industry in Europe. When he went over I said, "I am informed that the coal miners of Wales have a far higher standard of living than the coal miners of the United States. I wish you would find out whether that is so. We have been led to believe that the high tariffs made it possible for industry here in the lumber, coal, and other industries to pay wages that would give the American laboring man a higher standard of living; and if that could be exemplified, it certainly should be on coal."

To my astonishment, when this gentleman returned he said he got the surprise of his life when he went over there, because he did find that the Welsh coal miners, over whom so much sympathy has been expressed in the papers and on the platform and by men in public and private life in the United States, had a much better standard of living than the coal miners of the United States.

When we bear these things in mind, it seems to me they should lead us to believe that possibly we have been on the wrong track for quite a number of years in tinkering with tariffs, in pursuing policies that have gotten us into the situation where we are, and that while we may be making efforts to remedy conditions, we have not found any constructive, fundamental thing to do about stopping the depression and stopping the descending price level. We spend our time here talking about futile actions like tinkering with the tariff to revive industry when the whole country is in the grip of economic forces that, if allowed to continue, would drive the price level still further down, destroying values, destroying credit, destroying confidence, destroying production, increasing unemployment. Yet we spend our time here tinkering with tariffs!

I do not believe that any votes are going to be changed by this debate. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate simply for the purpose of postponing action; but I did not want this occasion to go by without uttering a few words of protest against the futile, time-wasting program that has been forced upon us by bringing these tariff items into the tax bill. I want to warn the Senate again that if we are to persist in making this a tariff bill, we should go the limit and make it a complete tariff bill. We can not make fish of one and fowl of the other. If there is any benefit in the tariffs that have been proposed, we can not place these four industries in a preferred position to collect from the pockets of the American people on the necessities that they must buy—coal, lumber, oil, gasoline, and copper.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Byrnes	Fess	Howell
Austin	Capper	Fletcher	Hull
Bailey	Caraway	Frazier	Johnson
Bankhead	Carey	George	Jones
Barbour	Cohen	Glass	Kean
Barkley	Connally	Goldsborough	Kendrick
Bingham	Coolidge	Gore	Keyes
Blaine	Copeland	Hale	King
Borah	Costigan	Harrison	La Follette
Bratton	Couzens	Hastings	Lewis
Brookhart	Dale	Hatfield	Logan
Broussard	Davis	Hawes	Long
Bulkley	Dickinson	Hayden	McGill
Bulow	Dill	Hebert	McNary
Moses	Robinson, Ark.	Steiwer	Walcott
Neely	Robinson, Ind.	Thomas, Idaho	Walsh, Mass.
Norris	Schall	Thomas, Okla.	Walsh, Mont.
Nye	Sheppard	Townsend	Watson
Oddie	Shipstead	Trammell	White
Patterson	Shortridge	Tydings
Pittman	Smith	Vandenberg
Reed	Smoot	Wagner

Mr. FESS. I am advised that the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is detained on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to the committee amendment, which will be reported for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 244, line 7, after the word "measure," the Senator from Florida proposes to insert:

Phosphate rock (phosphorites, collophane, and apatites) containing more than 70 per cent of tribasic phosphate of lime, 8 cents per 100 pounds.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], and vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is detained from the Senate on account of illness. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN]. In his absence I withdraw my vote.

Mr. TYDINGS (after having voted in the negative). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. I understand that if he were present he would vote the same as I have voted, and I therefore allow my vote to stand.

Mr. HATFIELD. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON]. I do not know how he would vote if present, and I therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. HASTINGS. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS]. I understand that Senator has not voted, and I therefore withdraw my vote, not knowing how he would vote if present.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana, and in his absence I withdraw my vote.

So Mr. TRAMMELL's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the committee amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 244, after line 5, the committee report, to insert:

(6) Lumber, rough, or planed or dressed on one or more sides, $3 per thousand feet, board measure; but the tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I desire to present briefly my objections to the pending amendment. The pending amendment takes from the free list rough lumber and imposes a tax of $3 per thousand feet. Lumber planed or dressed, which has a tax of $1 per thousand feet under existing law, under this amendment increases or adds to that tax $3 per thousand feet, making a total tax of $4 per thousand feet upon lumber planed or dressed and $3 per thousand feet upon rough lumber.

Mr. President, an impression has gone through the country that we are dealing with only four commodities in the revenue bill for the purpose of levying tariff duties. As a matter of fact, we are dealing with hundreds of commodities, and these innocent-appearing paragraphs contain within them increased tariff duties on hundreds of manufactured commodities. I have had a list of these articles prepared. I shall not take the time to read them all, but the extent to which increased tariff duties are to be levied upon articles manufactured in this country and used by our people can be observed by an examination of the list which I hold in my hand and which contains several hundred commodities.

I want to speak now about those manufactured articles which will be affected by the levying of this duty upon lumber both rough and planed or dressed. The first item affected is in paragraph 401 of the tariff act. Dressed lumber of fir, spruce, pine, hemlock, or larch carries a duty of $1 per thousand feet. This amendment will increase that duty to $3 per thousand feet.

Maple (except Japanese), birch, and beech flooring, in paragraph 402 of the tariff act, have a duty of 8 per cent ad valorem. To this is to be added a tax of $3 per thousand feet.

Spanish cedar, lignum vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, Japanese white oak, Japanese maple, in form of sawed board, planks, deal, and other forms not further manufactured than sawed, and flooring, in paragraph 404 of the tariff act have a duty of 15 per cent ad valorem and to that is to be added now a duty of $3 per thousand feet.

Rough lumber in paragraph 401 is free, and it is now proposed to levy under this amendment a duty of $3 per thousand feet.

Under paragraph 1803 of the tariff act, known as the basket clause, sawed lumber and lumber not specially provided for is free. Under this amendment whatever may fall within that provision of the law will bear a tax of $3 per thousand feet.

A large number of wood manufacturers are obliged to import wood into this country. Certain kinds of wood are not produced in this country that are used by a large number of manufacturers. For instance, let us take the furniture manufacturers of this country. Manufacturers of furniture would be taxed on their raw material. The lumber entering into the manufacture of furniture is here being taxed at $3 per thousand feet, and as a result we will be called upon to enact compensatory duties on furniture. This tax will apply on the lumber used in making the baby's cradle and as well upon the lumber for the coffin in which the dead are buried. We are imposing a tax that will be a burden upon the people of the United States from the cradle to the grave.

The manufacturers of lead pencils, the manufacturers of certain types of coffins, the manufacturers of containers, the manufacturers of a great variety of store fixtures, trunks, picture frames, tobacco boxes, toys, penholders, brushes, artificial limbs, airplanes, and pattern making.

Automobile manufacturers can not get a sufficient supply of birch and maple lumber of the proper size and grades. These manufacturers require thick stock, from 1½ to 3 inches thick, and our timber supply of birch and maple is so depleted that manufacturers must go to Canada to get their necessary supplies. This imported lumber, when fabricated into an automobile body, will be subject to a further sales or manufacturers' excise tax of 3 or 4 per cent in this revenue bill under section 602.

These manufacturers have been given no compensatory duties in the pending amendment. The manufacturers of copper have been given a compensatory duty. It means that just as soon as this amendment is adopted and the tax rate named therein becomes law there will be a demand, an insistent demand, from these manufacturers for compensatory duties—a demand which we will have to recognize and respect. That means there will be increased duties levied upon the large number of wood manufactures. So much for that phase of the subject.

There are two striking objections that ought to lead the Senate to recognize the unsoundness of the proposal at this time. First of all, this very question has been passed upon, extensive hearings conducted, and a decision made by the United States Tariff Commission as late as last September. The investigation was so extensive and so thorough that it is estimated that $55,000 was spent by the United States Tariff Commission to determine whether or not the petitioners for increased duties were entitled to have them levied. The decision made by the Tariff Commission is as follows:

The commission finds that the facts with regard to the difference in the cost of production, excluding transportation, from markets of the United States do not warrant a change in the duty of $1 per thousand feet board measure expressly fixed by statute.

On December 2, 1931, the President of the United States approved this report.

I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a list of the Senators who voted to incorporate in the tariff act the so-called flexible provision, for it seems to me inconceivable that Senators who voted to intrust the United States Tariff Commission with the right of investigation, and with the power of recommendation by the President, of increases and decreases in tariff duties should now, a few months after an exhaustive study and report, repudiate the finding of the Tariff Commission, repudiate the judgment of the President, and come here to demand a tariff duty of $3 per thousand feet upon rough lumber and a duty amounting to $4 per thousand feet upon lumber sawed and planed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The list referred to is as follows:

Bingham, Broussard, Capper, Dale, Dill, Fess, Glenn, Goldsborough, Hale, Hastings, Hebert, Jones, Kean, Keyes, McNary, Metcalf, Oddie, Patterson, Reed, Robinson of Indiana, Shortridge, Smoot, Steiwer, Thomas of Idaho, Townsend, Trammell, Vandenberg, Walcott, and Waterman.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, if the Tariff Commission were unable to find in November last any justification for an increase in the tariff duty on sawed lumber of $1 per thousand feet, how can we, in the face of the impartial examination made by that tribunal, justify the levying now of a duty of $3 in addition to the $1 already fixed by law? They found the $1 duty on sawed lumber was sufficient and satisfactory and ample, and yet we propose to add to that $3 per thousand feet of lumber sawed and planed. That alone ought to defeat the amendment. I do not see how a satisfactory explanation can be made that does not involve the repudiation of the Tariff Commission and of the judgment of the President.

I come now to a second very serious objection to the proposed amendment. The fact that no distinction is made in the duty on lumber on the type used by the farmer and the home builder and lumber used on more extensive construction and industrial projects would result in this duty being equivalent to 33⅓ per cent ad valorem on cheap lumber costing $12 per thousand, and a duty of less than 1 per cent ad valorem on expensive lumber selling at $250 and more per thousand feet—for instance, as used in airplanes and for mahogany paneling in high-priced office buildings and residences.

We are proceeding, Mr. President, not only to override the judgment of the Tariff Commission in opposition to increasing this duty but we are proceeding upon the request of self-interested petitioners to give them the full amount of their demands, which will result in an increased cost to the great volume of dressed lumber that is used in the building projects of the poorer classes and provide for a rather meager increase in the price of lumber used in the more expensive home building and in the making of the more expensive furniture.

Mr. President, let us inquire as to just what the word "lumber" includes. American Lumber Standards, published by the Bureau of Standards, of the Department of Commerce, and adopted by unanimous action in four general conferences in which the entire American lumber industry was represented, gives the following definition of lumber:

> Lumber is the product of the saw and planing mill not further manufactured than by sawing, resawing, and passing lengthwise through a standard planing machine, crosscut to length, and matched.

Upon the basis of this definition, and certainly there is no better authority to whom we could go for a definition, the National Lumber Manufacturers Association, in its publication, Lumber and Timber Information, February, 1931, says there is included under this definition such articles as:

Finish, casing and base, flooring, ceiling, siding, partition, silo stock, ladder stock, piano posts, cross arms, and other wood cut in the sawmill and planed or not planed for specified uses, boards, dimension, joists and plank, small sawed timbers, large sawed timbers, sawed cross and switch ties, small-dimension stock—that is, stock ready cut to specified, usually small, dimensions—lath, shingles (possibly), veneer (possibly).

Some even claim that the term "lumber" would include shingles and also veneered woods. I personally do not think that the term "lumber" could be said to include shingles or veneered woods; but, Mr. President, it probably does include flooring; and flooring under existing law has a duty of 8 per cent ad valorem. It is therefore proposed to place an additional duty of $3 per thousand feet upon flooring. Now, let us see how that would work out. Flooring that is commonly used in the homes of the poorer classes sells at wholesale for about $40 per thousand feet. An ad valorem duty of 8 per cent would mean a cost of $3.20 per thousand feet of flooring of that grade.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I shall yield in just a moment.

The additional tax now proposed to be imposed of $3 per thousand feet would represent a tax of $6.20. Now I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. I should like to ask the Senator to develop further, if he will, the theory upon which he concludes that the pending proposal would include flooring. May I suggest to the Senator that flooring is now specifically provided for and that the language of the pending proposal is substantially the same as that in the existing tariff law, save that there is no exception with respect to rough material? Under the present tariff act of 1930 has it been successfully contended that flooring is included in the provision placing a duty of $1 a thousand upon dressed lumber?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No, sir; it has not been.

Mr. STEIWER. Is not the language of the proposal now before the Senate, so far as inclusion is concerned, substantially the same as that of the existing law?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes, sir; but the language used in this amendment is "lumber, planed and dressed." I inquire of the Senator from Oregon, Is not flooring "lumber, planed and dressed"?

Mr. STEIWER. I answer the Senator's query with a question: Is it not true that the existing law provides a duty of $1 a thousand upon dressed lumber?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; it is defined in much the same way.

Mr. STEIWER. Of course; but the duty on flooring is in an entirely different paragraph. This article is specified by a different name and seemingly was not covered in the 1930 act by the word "lumber." There is no basis for the belief that it would be included in the pending amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator from Oregon say that boards are included in the term "lumber, sawed and planed"?

Mr. STEIWER. By common acceptation and by Congress itself in enacting the tariff law boards are included, but flooring has never been.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator say that wallboard and paneling used on the walls of a room are lumber?

Mr. STEIWER. I think so.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. How can it be concluded, then, that flooring, which is nothing but planed boards, is not included?

Mr. STEIWER. Because it is specifically provided for in another part of the tariff law.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator offer an amendment excluding it from this bill?

Mr. STEIWER. I do not want to put myself in the position of offering to amend the committee amendment, but I would have no objection to such an amendment, so far as I am personally concerned.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the fact that it is provided for in another paragraph of the tariff act, of course, does not affect this amendment. This amendment provides for a duty to be levied in addition to whatever duties may be levied in the tariff act.

Mr. STEIWER. I would agree with the Senator entirely if the language of the pending proposal were not substantially the same as that of existing law, but because it is substantially the same as existing law, it occurs to me that it will be construed in the same way as existing law, so far as the question of inclusion or exclusion of flooring is concerned.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have realized that objection might be made to the assertion that flooring was included in the definition of lumber, and I have made inquiries on the subject. I had a table prepared showing what the effect would be and what kinds of lumber would be affected by this duty, and all the information I received indicated that flooring was included as one of the kinds of lumber that would be affected by this duty. I hope I am mistaken, and that flooring is not included, but it seems to me there is a very great possibility of its being included in this duty.

Mr. President, this discussion leads to the consideration of another feature of these tariff amendments, which have apparently escaped the attention of many up to the present time. The tariff items proposed to be attached to this revenue bill are excluded from the operation of the flexible provision of the United States tariff act. Every other duty levied on commodities bearing tariff duties are subject to review and investigation and to an increase or decrease. It is proposed now to segregate these particular commodities so that they will not be subject to any review by the Tariff Commission, and so that the rates can not be increased or can not be lowered, thus giving to coal, oil, lumber, and copper an entirely different status from all other tariffs.

What will the country say when the people fully realize that in the shaping of a revenue bill we have proceeded to incorporate a new tariff bill, different in principle from the present existing tariff law, and making the duties on certain selected commodities independent of action by the United States Tariff Commission, independent of any action by the President, and subject only to change by act of Congress?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. As one of those who are deeply interested in these rates, and deeply believe in their justification, may I say to the Senator that I would welcome a further amendment to the general schedule which would bring them within the Tariff Commission?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I propose to offer one if it is not presented by some other Senator. I think it is a rather remarkable fact that the attention of the country has not been called up to the present time, so far as I know, to the fact that this tariff measure is entirely separate, entirely removed from that portion of the present tariff law known as the flexible tariff provision, which accords some protection to the public when a rate becomes unbearable, or when a rate is so small that it is important in the interest of a domestic producer that it be increased.

Not only have we here a tariff bill different in form and different in character from the existing general tariff law, but we have a tariff bill which appears to deal with only four items, but yet which deals with hundreds of items, which contains hidden increases and tariff duties on articles that are connected with the four commodities specifically mentioned. Let me read just a few of the items that will have increased duties levied upon them if the amendment providing tariff rates shall finally be agreed to. I select items at random.

Telegraph, telephone, and other wires, and cables of copper, covered under paragraph 316 of the present tariff law, are accorded an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent, and, in addition, 4 cents per pound on the copper content.

Woven-wire cloth, gauze, fabric, or screen, brass, copper, or bronze, under paragraph 318 of the tariff act, bears an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent, and other classifications 40 per cent, and still other classifications 50 per cent. In this bill there is an increased duty of 3 cents a pound.

Hardware, bronze or brass, under paragraph 397 of the present tariff law, has an ad valorem duty of 45 per cent, and in this bill a duty of 3 cents per pound more is added.

Harness hardware of brass, under paragraph 345 of the present law, has an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent, and in this bill 3 cents per pound more is added.

Saddlery or riding bridle hardware, of brass, under paragraph 345 of the present law, has an ad valorem duty of 50 per cent, and in this bill an additional duty of 3 cents per pound.

Broken bells and bell metal, under paragraph 1620 of the present tariff act, are free; in this bill they would have a duty of 4 cents a pound.

Manganese copper is dutiable under paragraph 302 of the existing law at 25 per cent ad valorem. The adoption of the duty on copper as provided in this bill would add 3 cents a pound.

Copper foil, under paragraph 397 of the existing law, has a tariff of 45 per cent ad valorem. Under this bill, if a duty on copper should finally be enacted into law, there will be an additional 3 cents a pound.

Piano wire, brass, under paragraph 1541 of the existing law, has an ad valorem duty of 40 per cent, to which would be added under this bill 3 cents a pound.

Musical instrument strings, chief value of copper, under paragraph 1541 of the present law, have a duty of 40 per cent ad valorem. This bill would add 3 cents a pound more.

Musical instruments, chief value of copper, under paragraph 1541, have a duty of 40 per cent ad valorem. Under this bill there would be added 3 cents per pound.

Tinsel wire, chief value of copper, under paragraph 385 of the existing law, has a duty of 6 cents per pound and 10 per cent ad valorem. Under the proposed copper duty in this bill the rate would be increased 3 cents per pound.

I will not take the time, Mr. President, to enumerate more of these articles, but there are, as I have said, hundreds of them that will be subjected now to an increased duty. I regret to say that I have not been able to translate these compensatory duties of 3 cents per pound into ad valorem terms; but if we were able to do that, we would find that many of these articles will, after the adoption of the amendment we have now under consideration and the other amendments in the tariff items of this bill, make a protective duty in some cases as high as 100 per cent and in other cases even higher than that.

Mr. President, I know the Senate is tired of the discussion of these tariff questions; and I am not going to detain it any longer, except once more to call attention to the fact that in dealing with this particular question we have an adjudication of all the facts and all the elements dealing with the question of whether or not there ought to be an increased duty upon lumber. Only last November the Tariff Commission said, "The facts and the evidence do not justify an increase."

Then the duty was $1 per thousand. The President approved the report in December; and here now, upon the petition of a small group of lumber dealers in the northwestern section of the country, it is proposed not to increase the duty above $1 per thousand feet but to increase the duty to $4 per thousand feet! I think the same report shows that the difference in the cost of production of rough lumber in Canada and here is 11 cents per thousand feet.

In addition to that, we will have here immediately, and properly so, the manufacturers of automobile bodies, the manufacturers of furniture, the manufacturers of lead pencils, the manufacturers of coffins, the manufacturers of cradles, the manufacturers of all wood products, asking for compensatory duties. They must come here, because now their wood is to be taxed $4 per thousand feet; and many of these woods are not produced in this country. I wish I had time to show the extent to which the automobile manufacturers, who are already pretty heavily burdened with taxes in this bill, have to go to Canada for certain grades of lumber that they need in the manufacture of the bodies of their automobiles.

Again I call attention—I suppose it is all in vain—to the injustice of a specific duty of $3 per 1,000 feet, representing a 33⅓ per cent ad valorem rate upon the lumber used in the cheapest of our homes and in the cheapest of buildings, as compared with a rate of only two or three per cent upon the fine, expensive mahogany and other woods that are imported into this country to panel the expensive office buildings in our cities and to make expensive furniture for the well to do.

Mr. President, the total importations of Canadian lumber against which the proponents of this amendment are seeking an embargo are only about 3.6 per cent of the total lumber consumed in the United States. Furthermore, the United States exports to other countries over twice as much lumber as she imports from Canada.

If the attempt to exclude Canadian importations of lumber succeeds the Canadian producer will send the lumber excluded from the United States to other foreign markets at the expense of the American producer. Indeed, it is quite possible that if Canada is shut out of the United States markets she might be able to negotiate preference or trade agreements which would completely exclude American lumber from the foreign market, with a consequent loss to the American producer of double the amount of Canadian importations.

American lumber is now exported to Cuba, South America, China, Japan, and other markets. The advocates of this duty are seeking to retain this export trade by excluding Canadian lumber. On the contrary, Canadian lumber excluded from America will drive American lumber out of the foreign countries above named. The result will be that the advantage that the American producers of lumber now have of exporting 100 per cent of lumber in excess of imports will be lost.

Furthermore, Mr. President, any benefit to the American lumber producers, who are few in number—it being estimated that all the lumber produced in the Northwest is in the control of 16 groups—would be at the expense of the general public. The proposed tax would fall upon the consumers of every article of lumber used in the United States.

Eliminating the effect of pyramiding the duty of $3 per thousand increase of the present duty, based upon an average consumption of about 35,000,000,000 feet, will result in a total cost to consumers in the United States of approximately $105,000,000 annually.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this amendment, above all others in this bill, is indefensible and ought to be voted down.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator requested the printing of certain names in the RECORD. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I ask also to have printed in the RECORD certain other data that I have.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TABLE OF DUTIES LEVIED IN THE PENDING REVENUE BILL

The extent of the revision of the present tariff law is disguised in several brief paragraphs of the pending revenue bill.

Instead of affecting four commodities, the duties levied are far-reaching in their effect. These four brief paragraphs constitute amendments to 5 of the 16 schedules of the tariff act and increase the duties on hundreds of commodities.

I present a schedule containing a partial list of the vast number of manufactured articles upon which these four amendments will assess compensatory duties.

While no attempt has been made to provide compensatory rates for manufacturers of lumber, a demand for compensatory duties can not be avoided by wood manufacturers who in innumerable instances must import lumber—about, for the first time, to be subjected to a duty of $3 per thousand feet—in order to produce their manufactured articles, such as caskets, refrigerators, trucks, picture frames, tobacco boxes, toys, pencils, brushes, airplanes, pattern making, etc.

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF CUSTOMS,
May 23, 1932.

Memorandum for Senator DAVID I. WALSH, from the Commisssioner of Customs.

I have had Mr. Ashworth, the chief of the tariff classification division, indicate the tariff classification of the articles submitted in your list, under the tariff act of 1930.

The list is prepared in view of the provision in H. R. 10236, which carries a provision on page 244 for a tax on "lumber, rough or planed or dressed on one or more sides" of $3 per thousand feet. In the classification of woods and manufactures of wood unless an article is specifically provided for by name it is dutiable under paragraph 412 as an article manufactured wholly or in chief value of wood, but I note that there are a number of articles enumerated in the list submitted by you which indicate articles in chief value of metal, for example, firearms, elevators, clocks, professional and scientific instruments, etc. These would not be subject to classification as wood or manufactures of wood. The butchers' blocks, if merely a log of wood with the bark off and of a size to be used by butchers, would probably be free of duty under paragraph 1803.

You will note that there have been grouped under one classification trimmings, moldings, and other millwork as free of duty under paragraph 1803 or dutiable under paragraph 401. This classification has been given for the reason that the courts have gone very far in placing under the free provision in paragraph 1803, and the corresponding paragraphs of previous tariff acts, articles of wood which might very reasonably be considered manufactures of wood. It should be noted, however, that Congress has recognized that the lumber provided for in paragraph 1803 is in fact a manufactured article because it provides for articles "not further manufactured." The question was presented to me this morning whether paragraph 6, on page 244 of the bill, would be construed to impose a tax on laths. Paragraph 1803 provides by name for laths, indicating that in the opinion of Congress they are not within the classification of "lumber." However, laths are, in my opinion, as much the product of the lumber mill as flooring, molding, and similar articles, and would, therefore, seem to be included within the term "rough lumber." Reverting to the subject of articles in part of wood, but in chief value of some other material, your attention is invited to guns. The gunstocks are ordinarily of wood, but even if the guns were not specially provided for in the tariff act they would be dutiable as in chief value of metal, and as Congress may desire to impose a compensatory duty on stocks attention is invited to paragraph 7 on page 244 of the bill, on copper.

F. X. A. EBLE.

Articles on which compensatory duties can be demanded if the proposed tax of $3 per thousand board feet on lumber in H. R. 10236 is enacted

Re: Statistics, lumber distribution.
Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: At the request of your secretary, I am inclosing three photostats showing the computed consumption of hardwood lumber and of softwood lumber and of both combined for all States and regions of the United States in the calendar year 1930.

These figures are preliminary, subject to correction; but it is not contemplated that any extensive changes will be made. The probability is that the imports from Canada will be slightly increased, but there will be no resulting change in the total consumption or the per capita consumption.

The following information for New England, taken from reports of previous years, may be of interest:

In the decade beginning 1920 and ending 1930 the contribution of New England forests to the quantity of lumber consumed in New England decreased from 1,024,559,000 board feet to 491,463,000 board feet.

In the same period the contribution from the Pacific Northwest States (Washington and Oregon) increased from 88,087,000 board feet to 302,889,000 board feet.

The contribution of foreign lumber (principally from Canada) decreased from 428,393,000 board feet to 274,059,000 board feet.

The total quantity of lumber consumed decreased from 2,154,085,000 board feet to 1,387,185,000 board feet, resulting in a decrease of per capita from 290 board feet to 170 board feet.

It should be observed, however, that the peak of consumption in New England in this decade was in 1923 in which year the quantity consumed was 2,245,034,000 board feet with a per capita consumption of 290 board feet.

Very sincerely yours,

ROY HEADLEY, Acting Forester.

WINTON LUMBER CO.,
Washington, D. C., May 16, 1932.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Of what use is the "flexible clause" of the present tariff act?

In connection with the present tariff on lumber, in November, 1931, the Tariff Commission found "differences in costs of production, including transportation to the principal markets in the United States, of the domestic article and the like or similar article purchased in the principle competing country (Canada) * * * do not warrant a change in the duty of $1 per thousand feet board measure." On December 2, 1931, the President approved of the findings. Proponents of the tariff on lumber now in the revenue bill propose to override these findings of the Tariff Commission, which had made an exhaustive study of the subject.

The Tariff Commission was created by act of Congress to make scientific investigations of the necessity for changes in tariff rates. The proposed lumber tariff, if passed, will set the pernicious precedent of an appeal to Congress each time some faction in an industry dislikes one of the commission's findings, thereby defeating the whole purpose of the flexible clause. Aside from the lack of merit in the argument for an added lumber tariff, I believe that this point alone is sufficient cause to reject this section of the revenue bill, and I hope you will use your influence against it.

Respectfully,

R. C. WINTON.

SPOKANE, WASH., May 13, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

We are lumber manufacturers operating in Canada and the United States. Any increased tariff on lumber into the United States will not produce any revenue but rather discontinue the present revenue. Like everyone else, we want the Budget question settled and believe the sales tax the practical way to solve this question.

W. W. POWELL CO.

MAY 10, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In connection with the pending tax bill we regret to learn that the Senate Finance Committee has imposed a duty of $3 per thousand feet on softwood lumber, rough or dressed. This will certainly be unpopular with the farmers, the prospective builders, and the lumber-consuming public, if the record of 1929 and 1930 is any criterion.

We believe the anticipated revenue will prove a chimera. Canada is our chief source of supply on imported softwoods. In 1931 she only shipped us 671,589,000 feet (vide United States Department of Commerce). This amount at $3 per thousand would only provide $2,014,767. The $3 would be a virtual embargo on common or low-grade stock, so this figure would be excessive—a poor stroke of business, considering the damaging effect on our Canadian export trade.

It can not be justified on grounds of protection, as shown by the latest United States Tariff Commission report, after their recent investigation of the Canadian lumber industry.

As we understand it, all softwood lumber is lumped together, irrespective of species, which would seem to indicate that little or no study of the matter had been made by the committee. We certainly should have no tariff on spruce lumber and genuine white pine. Our supply of these woods is practically exhausted and we have to depend on Canada for much of our requirements.

We earnestly recommend that you vote to strike out the proposed lumber duty for the reason that it would produce a negligible revenue, be a serious blow to our Canadian trade, and in view of the fact that Canadian and American lumber costs are practically equal would amount to a virtual embargo.

Yours very respectfully,

THE NEW YORK LUMBER TRADE ASSOCIATION,
R. E. STOCKING,
Chairman Legislative Committee.

CHICAGO, ILL., May 10, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In my letter filed with the Senate Finance Committee on April 18, 1932, copy attached, I pointed out that the remaining stand of virgin northern white pine in the United States totaled less than 4,000,000,000 feet, or less than 1 per cent of the original stand, which is said by the Forest Service to have been 540,000,000,000 feet. The small remaining stand is fast disappearing, the domestic annual production of virgin northern white pine being about 150,000,000 feet.

Imports of virgin northern white pine from Canada were less than 100,000,000 feet in 1931, with an average value of $40 per thousand board feet, delivered, with freight added. An excise tax or tariff of $3 per thousand feet on rough and dressed lumber, coupled with the present tariff of $1 per thousand feet on dressed lumber, would make the duty $4 per thousand feet on dressed lumber and $3 per thousand feet on rough lumber. The proposed tax would yield very little revenue, but would tend to exclude these imports, thus hastening the depletion of a forest resource that is irreplaceable.

Virgin northern white pine has special uses such as in the manufacture of rifle containers, tobacco containers, window-shade rollers, and many other industrial uses. It also has distinctive uses such as in the making of patterns. Patterns of wood are used by the United States Government in the molding and manufacture of guns, gun parts, and other ordnance equipment. There are 300,000 patterns in stock at the Washington Navy Yard alone, varying in size from a few inches to patterns large enough to form the molds for the longest range guns. At the various Army and Navy posts throughout the United States patterns are also used in large quantities. The Government has found that virgin northern white pine is most suitable for these purposes.

The United States Tariff Commission, in its report on lumber, issued November 9, 1931, pointed out that in the Chicago market Canadian white pine lumber was at a disadvantage of $2.66 per thousand feet. By far the majority of the virgin northern white pine imports go to Chicago and the surrounding territory—Minnesota, Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

I also wish to remind you of the widespread opposition to a tariff on lumber expressed by retail lumber dealers and associations, millwork manufacturers, and the principal farm organizations throughout the country. During the writing of the 1930 tariff act more than 1,500 prominent organizations and firms, representing thousands of consumers throughout the United States, signed briefs opposing the imposition of duties on lumber. No new arguments favoring a duty have been developed. The farmers who consume 45 per cent of the annual lumber consumption naturally stand in the same position against a duty, as do the retailers and wholesalers who feel that a duty would not benefit the domestic industry but would hamper our present trade relations.

May we count on your assistance in striking out the Finance Committee proposal in H. R. 10236 for an excise tax on lumber of $3 per thousand board feet?

Very truly yours,

HERMAN H. HETTLER LUMBER CO.,
By SANGSTON HETTLER, President.

BLOEDEL, STEWART & WELCH (LTD.),
Seattle, May 11, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am submitting for your study the attached brief opposing the tariffs on softwood lumber which are at present included in the Senate revenue bill as excise taxes.

We wish to recommend for your special consideration two factors in the lumber tariff problem which would seem to be of decisive importance and which are fully dealt with in this brief.

1. The volume of imported softwood lumber is such a small per cent of the total domestic consumption that it could not possibly be a serious factor in the domestic lumber industry. The imports from Canada, the only important exporter of lumber to the United States, were 4.8 per cent of domestic consumption in 1929, 5 per cent in 1930, and 4.9 per cent in 1931. Furthermore, there can be no valid claim that these imports subjected the domestic product to unfair competition for the Tariff Commission in their report issued November 9, 1931, which was approved by the President of the United States, December 2, 1931, conclusively showed that the differences in cost of production between the two countries were small and were adequately provided for in the existing tariff of $1 per thousand feet on dressed lumber.

2. The proposed rates of $3 on rough lumber and $4 on dressed lumber were designed to and will absolutely eliminate softwood lumber imports. But the domestic manufacturer's problem will not thereby be solved, since foreign lumber forced out of the American market will find its place in world markets at the expense of the American exporter. This is most important in view of the fact that the United States at present exports roughly $45,000,000 worth of lumber and imports but one-third this amount.

Very truly yours,

J. H. BLOEDEL,
By PRENTICE BLOEDEL,
Secretary-Treasurer.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 4, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: You are a member of the party that has always been against a high-tariff policy. On this account we are appealing to you to oppose the proposed import tax on lumber, and for the following reasons:

(1) The Tariff Commission has investigated and found no need for a further tariff to protect American lumber manufacturers.

(2) Advocates for the tax base their case on the depression in the American lumber industry. There is no reason for subsidizing the lumber industry which is suffering no more than many others. Declines in prices of farm products have been double those of lumber.

(3) Any additional tax would be an embargo, with the result that no revenue would be produced. The revenue from the present lumber tariff would be lost.

(4) The total importations of lumber amount to only 3.6 per cent of our consumption. The exclusion of this insignificant proportion would not help the American industry or increase employment appreciably.

(5) Any benefits to the American producers would be at the expense of the general public, especially the farmer. The reasons for this are shown in the inclosed pamphlet.

(6) The owners of the Canadian spruce mills whom I represent have timber interests in the United States over eight times as great as in Canada. If the embargo tax would benefit our American companies, we would be for it; but we are sure it would not help them, and it would ruin our Canadian properties. Since my people are interested in this country in fir, yellow pine, and white pine, their opinion should be fairly representative.

These points and others are developed in the inclosed pamphlet to which your attention is respectfully invited. If further information is desired, I can be reached at the Hamilton Hotel.

Yours very truly,

R. C. WINTON.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-one Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. LONG and Mr. JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays and they were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not want to discuss this matter; but the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] was trying to get the eye of the Presiding Officer. He has gone into the cloakroom to answer a telephone call and will be back in a moment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to offer an amendment to the committee amendment. After the word "measure," on page 244, line 7, I move to insert "aluminum hydroxide or refined bauxite, one-fourth cent per pound."

That reduces the aluminum tariff about 50 per cent. As I understand the matter, no aluminum at all is coming into the country at present. There is a complete embargo; and, as this is a revenue measure, we should reduce the duty so as to get a little revenue from this concern, which is well able to pay it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, it might be well to have a vote on this matter. I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, does not the Senator from New York wish to address himself to the lumber schedule?

Mr. COPELAND. I may say to the Senator that I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. I will withdraw my amendment temporarily, in order to give the Senator from New York a chance to offer his.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland withdraws his amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment on page 244, line 6. I ask the omission of the word "rough," the second word in that line, so as to exclude rough lumber from the operation of the tariff.

I assume that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] will have no objection to accepting the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am sorry I can not agree to the suggestion of my good friend from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am not so simple as to think that any poor words of mine could change the result so far as this proposed tariff on lumber is concerned. I know that the Senate is predestined and foreordained to adopt the amendment of the committee, but I could not consent to have it adopted without calling attention to what will happen to my State by reason of this particular tariff proposal.

New York City is the greatest lumber market in the world; and, of course, the addition of this tariff to lumber will impose a great hardship on my State. I could enlarge upon that at considerable length. I could point out the great need that we have at the present time of aiding in construction, in promoting building, particularly the building of small homes. That is one kind of building which has not been overdone in America.

Too many hotels have been built, too many apartment houses have been built, too many monumental buildings have been built. Not by any means, however, have too many homes for the people been built.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If I recall the circumstances correctly, the Senator from New York offered an amendment similar to the one he is now offering to an amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington at the time the last tariff act was under consideration, and the amendment of the Senator from New York was accepted by the Senator from Washington at the time, with the result that the tariff act bears a duty upon lumber, sawed and planed, of a dollar a thousand, and rough lumber has been excluded. Am I correct?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator is seeking to exclude rough lumber from the committee amendment at this time?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct. The Senator will remember that I offered an amendment relating to timber hewn, sided, or squared otherwise than by sawing, and round timber used for spars, and so on, with a proviso for a countervailing duty.

As I was saying before my distinguished friend from Massachusetts interrupted me, it does seem to me that at this time, when we are attempting to improve conditions throughout the country, it is a great mistake to impose any tariff upon lumber. However, I am not going to argue that, because it is utterly useless to do so. I do appeal to the Senate, however, that rough lumber be excluded from this amendment offered by the committee.

The reason why I make the appeal is that there are in the northern part of my State great planing mills, where at the present time there is a tremendous amount of unemployment. Those mills are devoted to the planing and preparation of lumber, the basic material coming from Canada.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand that there are a large number of lumber mills in the Senator's State which receive rough lumber from Canada and manufacture it in the mills in his State.

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the Senator's attention ought to be called to the fact, if he does not know it, that the lumber dealers who are asking for this duty have not asked for a duty upon logs, but logs are to be admitted free of duty. Logs can come from British Columbia to the Northwestern States free of duty, but if the material in a second stage, namely, rough lumber, comes in from British Columbia, there will be a duty imposed. It seems to me that if the dealers in the Northwest are to get logs free of duty, there is an argument in favor of the Senator's position that rough lumber should come to the lumber mills of his State free.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator is right about that. Of course, there has been no effort, and I am glad there has not been, on the part of the proponents of this plan, to impose a tax upon logs, and I give them credit for that. But I should like to have the exemption apply also to rough lumber. Sometimes the timbers are squared and partly prepared in Canada and then shipped into the United States, where the planing and grooving and further preparation are carried out in American institutions.

Before the Senator interrupted me I referred to a telegram which I received from Maj. H. Morton Jones, of North Tonawanda, N. Y. I may say, of course, that this particular correspondent of mine has no objection to the tariff upon planed and prepared lumber, but he does make this plea:

> We want free rough lumber. This is raw material, and should be free. Suggest proposing amendment Jones bill exempting rough lumber from its provisions. This went through before because of the principle that it carried out regarding free raw material.

He asked me to oppose a tariff on rough lumber. I wish I knew more in detail the statistics as to the importations of rough lumber. I have asked the Tariff Commission for them, but it seems difficult to separate the figures, and they have not yet come to my hand. I ask the Senator from Washington whether he is advised as to the amount of the importations of rough lumber.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am not advised as to the amounts in the different classes.

Mr. COPELAND. I wonder whether any other Senator has those figures. I have not been able to find where they have been broken down so as to show the importations of rough lumber.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, Mr. Whitcomb, of the Tariff Commission, stated over the phone a moment ago that the softwoods; that is, fir, and so forth, came in to the amount of 386,000,000 feet during the calendar year 1931. That was dutiable. Another grade of rough lumber, the character of which I did not get, not subject to duty, came in to the extent of 287,000,000 feet.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, the latter figure is the figure covering logs and other articles which come in without the tariff.

It is a matter of concern to thousands of employees in my State that there should be the exemption for which I am pleading. A good many of our planing-mill owners in northern New York own forests in Canada, and they bring down the raw material from which the planed and prepared lumber is made.

The Congress has always taken the position that raw material should be free of duty. My distinguished and able friend the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the greatest advocate of protection on the face of the earth, has always taken the position that raw material should be duty free, that there should be the encouragement to American enterprise afforded by the free importation of raw material, that American genius and labor may be devoted to the fabricating of that material, making it into a product which could be sold at a profit. His further argument is that, having prepared that material by high-priced American labor, having insisted on maintaining our standards of American living, it is right that there should be a tariff imposed, so that our labor might not have to compete with slave labor, or serf labor, or peasant labor, or low-priced labor of any sort, in the other parts of the world.

I am not proposing, then, any new tariff plan. I am proposing one which has been our long-established rule of procedure. I have never posed as a free trader. I have never subscribed to the doctrine that imposing a tariff for revenue was the only course we should pursue. I have believed always in protection, and dozens of times have argued here in favor of protection, and perhaps some may consider my tariff record as a bad one. The distinguished junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] the other night read my name as one of those who had voted for increases and against many decreases.

I am making a plea to the Senate for this principle, for which I myself have stood, that raw materials should be free, no matter how much we might tax the finished material, a principle which I am asking the Senate to abide by to-day.

I wish we had more accurate information as to the real significance of the proposal I make. It is not my fault that we have not that information at our disposal. But I doubt whether the interests of the Northwest would suffer by reason of the acceptance of the principle embodied in this amendment, which we have applied heretofore in all of our tariff legislation.

I ask, therefore, that the amendment which I have presented may be accepted by the Senate and that rough lumber be excluded from the tariff rate proposed by the pending amendment.

Does the Senator from Washington feel that it would be impossible for him to accept this suggestion?

Mr. JONES. Yes, Mr. President; I think we have gone far enough toward admitting raw materials when we allow logs to come in free of duty, and I hope the pending amendment will be defeated.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate by any extended remarks. I simply want to emphasize what this would mean. If rough lumber is taxed at the rate of $3 a thousand, it will mean that mills in my State now employing many men will be closed, as factories, as manufacturing establishments all over the country have been closed one after the other during the past couple of years.

I hope the Senate may be impressed with the idea that we should continue a long-established practice of the Senate by exempting from taxation the raw materials which go into products made in the United States. I plead for free rough lumber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEBERT in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], on page 244, line 6, after the word "lumber," to strike out the word "rough."

Mr. COPELAND. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HATFIELD (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as upon the previous vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. I understand if he were present he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. BYRNES. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. If present, that Senator would vote "nay." If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. HULL. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], on account of illness. If present, he would vote "yea." Had he been present when the vote was cast on the oil and coal tariff proposals he would have voted in opposition to the imposition of such tariffs.

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM]. In his necessary absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. HATFIELD. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON] to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] are necessarily detained on official business.

I also wish to announce that the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] and the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON] are necessarily out of the city.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 47, as follows:

So Mr. COPELAND's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate for any lengthy address upon this subject. When the subject of placing tariff rates in the tax bill was first discussed I believed that it should not contain tariff items. But the Finance Committee saw fit to bring into the Senate certain tariff items, and they are now here for action.

There are those in the Senate who have attempted to say that a vote for or against tariff items is a vote in accordance with or opposed to the policy of the Democratic Party. So far as I can determine, the Democratic Party has declared no policy on the subject of the tariff in this Congress except what is declared in the bill that went to the President some days ago and was vetoed. That was a bill which would have authorized the President to enter into negotiations with other countries for the purpose of reducing tariffs through reciprocity. It contains also a provision whereby the Tariff Commission would investigate and report to Congress as to tariff items. On that policy the Democrats of the House and the Democrats of the Senate were unanimous, and so it seems to me that we are confronted with the proposition that so far as this President is concerned we are to have a continuation of the high-tariff policy.

I come to-day to speak not for a special privilege for lumber but for equal treatment for lumber. I am not here to-day to ask any favors for the part of the country which I represent but to ask that products of that section of the country shall not be discriminated against by the Congress.

I am not one of those who seek to place themselves above the demands and the interests of their State. I am not one of those who take the position that is the duty of Members of the Senate to leave conditions as they now are as a result of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act.

For many years this country has been the beneficiary of protection, but since the passage of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act it has become the victim of protection. Other countries have decided at last to use the weapon in the form of a tariff which this country has so long used against them. I have not myself investigated the facts, but I have read in responsible publications the statement that 70 other nations have raised their tariff rates in retaliation against the tariff rates imposed in the Hawley-Smoot Act.

I know that a tariff wall has been raised between the United States and Canada. I know that our neighbors on the north have used the Hawley-Smoot rates as an excuse for placing retaliatory rates upon the products of this country so high that they amount practically to an embargo.

I said a moment ago that other nations had decided to use the tariff weapon against us. They have done more than that. They have not only followed our example, they have bettered it. They have not stopped with simply levying tariff rates against us, they have proceeded to use quotas by which they determine the percentage of any American products that may come within their borders. They have used licenses; they have placed actual embargoes upon American products. Then, in addition to all that, they have decided to use depreciated currencies.

I say they are using depreciated currencies as a weapon because when England went off the gold standard, which her financial condition made necessary, the countries of northern Europe, whose financial condition was entirely sound, left the gold standard in order that they might trade with the British Empire. Thus there has been set up in the countries of northern Europe a system of depreciated currencies primarily for the purpose of trade, and not because of their financial conditions. What is the result? A depreciated currency is as perfect a tariff wall as can possibly be erected around any country, because the moment the products of a country such as ours reach the borders of a nation having depreciated currency their cost is translated into the foreign currency and the price is raised by exactly the amount of the depreciation.

The State of Washington produces more boxes of apples than any other State in this Union. I was in the apple section of the State, where apples are produced in greatest quantities, last fall when England and the countries of northern Europe went off the gold standard. During the few days I was there every evening when I would drive into one of those towns I was met with the information that orders from those European countries for several thousand boxes of apples had been canceled. Why? Because, owing to the depreciation of their currency amounting to 30 per cent, they could buy the apples from other countries at an actual cost of 60 cents a box less than they could buy them from this country. So thousands and thousands of boxes of apples that had been contracted for were not sold in those markets simply because of the depreciated-currency weapon which those nations were using against us.

I listened to the Senator from Massachusetts the other day, and I listened to-day to his argument as to the quantity of lumber that goes out of our country compared with the quantity that comes in, and his argument was that because of that difference there should be no tariff on lumber. Mr. President, lumber is a heavy product; lumber is a product whose selling price is tremendously affected by the cost of transportation; and I want to remind the Senate now that 80 per cent of all lumber imports of the United States come from Canada and 95 per cent of the softwood imports come from Canada. All along our northern border we are practically in the position of having free trade in lumber, while the Canadians levy tremendous tariffs against us.

What are the facts? Last year we exported into Canada more than $580,000,000 worth of products, and from them she collected under her new rates $122,000,000 in revenue. She exported into this country $402,000,000 of products, and for them we collected $20,000,000 in revenue. In other words, in this tariff war Canada has erected her tariffs so high that she collects from four to five times as much revenue off our products than we collect off hers.

I sent to the Department of Commerce in order that I might secure the facts as to just what Canada has done in the way of retaliatory rates upon American products. I have found that as a result of the tariff we enacted in 1930 she has increased tremendously the rates on most of our products. On apples she has increased the rate from 90 cents a box of 20 per cent ad valorem, and has also increased her excise tax 3 per cent on oranges. The United States exports $12,000,000 worth of oranges to Canada; they were free before she put up her retaliatory rates, while to-day they are taxed 35 cents per cubic foot with 3 per cent excise tax.

On canned peaches, with a duty of only $2.50 per hundred before our last tariff bill was enacted, to-day the Canadian tariff is $5 a hundred. Consequently the shipment of peaches from the State of Washington to western Canada is absolutely embargoed and prohibited. On a carload of peaches exported from my State into Canada the tariff duties collected there are $1,057, while the value of the peaches is $378. So that they have absolutely stopped our shipments there.

The duty on peas was raised from $1.50 a hundred to $3 a hundred; potatoes, which were free of duty before our last tariff act went into effect, now are required to pay a duty of 75 cents a bushel. The duty on veal was formerly $6 a hundred, and now it is $8 a hundred; the duty on mutton was $6 and now it is $8 a hundred; the duty on fresh pork was 3 cents a pound and now it is 5 cents a pound. In fact, all forms of pork, pork sides, sausage, have been raised from 3¼ to 5 cents. On barley, of which we export $7,000,000 worth, the duty was raised from 31 cents to 52 cents per hundred; on wheat, of which we exported last year $27,000,000 worth, the rate was raised from 20 cents to 50 cents a bushel.

I desire to insert here the following table, showing the retaliatory rates imposed by Canada.

I mention these items to show that, as a result of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, retaliatory rates on the part of Canada have been placed upon our people to the extent of being practically an embargo on the products of the Northwest going into Canada. This year I am told the result will be that $1,500,000 worth of fruit which is ordinarily sold to British Columbia will not be sold there, and consequently much of our fruit will have no market whatsoever.

Thus, under the tariff wall which exists, Canada has gradually placed her retaliatory tariffs against everything which we produce in the Northwest; and yet her lumber pours down into our section of the country almost without restriction at all. In a tariff war, then, we have no protection on this one front, namely, the lumber front, and we come here in this situation not asking a special privilege, but asking that we shall have the same kind of treatment that has been meted out to other industries.

I have listened to Senators to-day speak against this proposed tariff rate because they say it will burden the farmer; and yet in the Smoot-Hawley bill we put tariffs on farm products almost without restraint, and we are to have before us in this bill a proposal to enact a debenture plan in order to give the farmer the benefit of the tariff.

This talk about special privilege comes down to this: Are we going to leave the industries of a few sections of the country without protection or are we going to pass the tariff along all the way around. I believe in high tariff for all or high tariff for none.

If the Congress sees fit to leave the door wide open, so that foreign lumber may pour down into the States of Washington and Oregon, and yet our products are to be excluded because of tariffs that already exist, of course, our people will be helpless to resist; but I can say to you now, Mr. President, there are many people in the Far West to-day who, in the face of this situation seriously ask one another, whether, if this Government is not to protect its people and their industries, they would not be better off if they were a part of the Canadian Dominion? We find ourselves victims of a tariff policy that protects other commodities in this country; we find ourselves victims of retaliatory rates; and we find our own industries without protection.

Something was said the other day by the Senator from Oklahoma about the suffering of the people in the oil sections because of the lack of employment. On the North Pacific coast lies the great city of Seattle, with normally about 150,000 voters. I have had letter after letter within the last month saying, "We are feeding to-day 60,000 people." That is because there is no labor for the people there, due largely to the closing of our lumber mills and our shingle mills, all as a result of this free lumber that comes down on us from Canada. I say to you, Mr. President, that the lumber industry of the Northwest, as a part of this country, is entitled to the same kind of treatment as has been meted out to the shoe factories in New England, as has been meted out to the woolen industry of New England, as has been meted out to the hat industry of the Atlantic coast, and as has been meted out to other industries all over America.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator stated that the Senator from Oklahoma said that there was great unemployment in the oil fields. I am not an oil man, but I should like to ask the Senator from Washington is it not a fact that the only way to bring about employment in the oil fields is to drill more wells? After a well is drilled, of course, and connected with a pipe line the employment around the oil well practically ceases; so the only way to make employment in the oil fields would be to drill more wells, and that would simply make a bad situation worse.

Mr. DILL. I am not here to argue the oil question; I am not fully informed about it; but I am here to say to the Senator when the mills of the Northwest are operating 20 per cent of full capacity and 40 per cent what they were operating in 1929, when we had the tariff bill before us, and that 80 per cent of the total imports of lumber come from Canada and 95 per cent of the softwood comes from Canada, and that the section of the country which I in part represent is the spearhead of that importation, that if we put on this import tax it would at least give our people the home market. We have almost sufficient lumber now cut by the mills and in the yards to supply the people of this country for the next year if we did not cut any at all. Because of that, and because of the competition, a tariff on lumber will not increase the price, but it will protect the market in this country for American lumber.

Senators talk about wanting to prevent a tariff on lumber because it will increase the cost of the building of homes. Sir, if you will take the tariffs off all other things that go into the building of homes, you will be in position then to ask us not to request a tariff on lumber; but the Congress has put a tariff upon cement; it has put a tariff upon asbestos; it has put a tariff upon practically everything, including lime, that goes into the building of homes; and yet the people of the Northwest are asked to continue to pay high prices for everything they buy, protected as other commodities are by high tariff rates, but that they themselves shall have no protection for a product which is the backbone of the economic life of the great Northwest.

I saw Senators stand upon this floor some days ago and heard them say that they acted only in the interest of the Nation; that they did not represent any special interest in their States. Well, sir, I speak not for others, but, as for myself, so long as the people of the State which I in part represent do me the honor to send me to this Chamber, I shall make it my chief business while I am here to represent them and the industries in which they are engaged and which they manage when they deserve such representation. The first duty of a Senator in this body, it seems to me, should be to look after the interests of those people whom he represents, when they are being unjustly and unfairly treated. If we came here and asked for a special privilege in favor of lumber when like protection is not given to other products, then, indeed, would we be asking the Congress to tax the Nation in our behalf, but when the Congress has placed taxes upon practically every other important product in America, with the few exceptions covered by the items in the pending bill before us to-day, we ask Congress to give us the same kind of treatment that is accorded the other sections of the country.

We may be a long way from the city of Washington, and we may be small in numbers in comparison to the population of the East and the Middle West, but we live in as fair a land as any over which this flag can float. We live in a land that looks to the future. We live in a land that faces the Orient and that faces the great Pacific, which will be the trade center of the world in the generations ahead of us. We come here representing those people, and we ask you to do for us in the product which is the backbone of the economic life of the north Pacific coast what you have done for long-staple cotton, what you have done for the hat industry in this country, what you have done for the shoe industry. I am sorry the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is not here, but I notice in the reports on industry that the shoe business is the one business in this country that has increased 6 per cent over last year. Six per cent is a small increase, it is true, but it is an increase, while the lumber business of the Northwest has decreased nearly 50 per cent in the last year.

So I say we speak not to-day for a special privilege; we speak here for equal treatment. I say to my Democratic colleagues, because we are opposed to a system which we believe gives special privileges to the industries of the country, are we who are Democrats under this system to vote against protection to our people while all the rest of the country is given protection? There is no equal opportunity in that, Senators. That is discrimination, a discrimination that can not be defended or excused in a country like ours.

The fact of the matter is that the great Northwest has been caught in the tariff trap, which, on the one hand, makes it impossible for our people to ship our normal exports of products into Canada, but, on the other hand, leaves the gate wide open for Canada to export her lumber upon us. What justice is there in a system of tariff war whereby Canada collects $122,000,000 from the products we send her and on an equal amount of products that come from Canada we collect but $20,000,000?

I do not want to delay the Senate. I do not want to take an undue amount of time. I can only repeat that in asking you for a tariff on lumber, we ask to be placed on a basis of equality with other products in this country.

We are not satisfied with giving the farmer a tariff upon the products of which he exports tremendous quantities and imports none at all, but we are going to give him the debenture. We Democrats have been most anxious to do that; but when it comes to the lumberman, it is a terrible crime that we will put anything on lumber and protect the people who produce lumber, when we have protected the people of every other State and practically every other part of the country on the products which they produce.

Is this a country in which you will discriminate against those sections which do not have a majority representation in this body, or is this a country where the representatives in this Chamber will give equal treatment to every section and every industry, whether it be represented by large numbers or only by a few?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I have listened with great interest to the able speech of the Senator; and he is, in my judgment, on sound Democratic ground. One of the greatest Democrats who ever lived uttered the statement that "The benefits and the burdens of government should rest equally upon all industries"—the benefits and the burdens.

Mr. DILL. Since the Senator speaks about my being on sound Democratic ground, I desire to call attention to the fact that there is not anything new or unusual about having a tariff on lumber, or on coal, or on oil, or on copper. They have been in tariff bills ever since we began to write important tariff bills.

The one tariff law in the history of this country that is held up as the ideal Democratic tariff bill of all history is the Walker tariff of 1846, drafted by Secretary Walker of Mississippi and signed by President Polk of Tennessee. That tariff bill contained a tariff on lumber. It contained a tariff on coal. It contained a tariff on oil. It contained a tariff on copper. Why? Because it was true to the Democratic principle that you should not discriminate against any one industry; but that if you put a tariff on one set of products, you should pass tariff protection around.

What right have you, as Senators in this body, by your votes to say that the people whom I represent in the great Northwest shall pay the increased price which a tariff necessarily adds to the cost of what they buy, but that upon the product of the dominant industry which we have and the products which we produce there shall be no tariff at all?

If that were a Democratic doctrine, I should be the first to denounce it; but the history of the Democratic Party shows that it has not been in the past, and it is not to-day the doctrine of men who understand the principle of equal treatment, who understand the principle of discriminating against none at all but giving all an equal opportunity.

Then in the tariff law of 1857, signed by President Buchanan and approved by Secretary of the Treasury Howell Cobb, of Georgia, we find tariffs upon oil and coal and lumber and copper.

In the revenue acts of 1861 and 1862, signed by President Lincoln and approved by Secretary Chase, we find tariffs on these products.

In the revenue act of 1865, signed by President Johnson, a Union Democrat of Tennessee, and approved by Secretary Fessenden, of Maine, we have another bill with a tariff on these products.

And so I might come on down through tariff legislation. Up until about 20 years ago we have always had a tariff on lumber. Why? Because the men in the House and Senate have said by their votes, "If you are going to put a tariff upon the products of one set of our people, the rest of the people of this country are entitled to equal treatment."

So I stand here to-day and plead that if New England is to have protection upon what she produces, if the South is to have the protection she wants, and if the Middle West is to have protection upon the products that are the backbone of her economic life, I beg you not to discriminate against those of us who live in the Far Northwest, who may be few in numbers, but who have our rights, we believe, under this country's Government, who are entitled, we believe, to the same kind of treatment that you mete out to other sections of the country.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks certain explanatory tables.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

COMMENTS ON PRESIDENT HOOVER'S LETTER

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to divert the attention of the Senate from the lumber tariff for just a moment.

We have heard much of efficiency and economy. On yesterday the President issued a letter to a Mr. Richard S.

Parker, said to be president of the American Society of Civil Engineers, of New York, giving his views at length upon the relief measures and against bond issues.

We have been very generous to the White House in making appropriations for an increased personnel up there. I believe other Presidents have had 1, 2, and 3 secretaries; but we were generous to Mr. Hoover and we have given him 4 secretaries. It is strange, however, that there is not more efficiency up there than there is.

There is no such man as Richard S. Parker. The letter is addressed to Mr. Parker as president of the American Society of Civil Engineers, New York; but no such man is president of the American Society of Civil Engineers in New York. Where the President got his letter from or how the mistake was made, nobody knows. It would seem that the President, being an engineer, ought to keep better tab on who is the president of a great organization like the American Society of Civil Engineers. Mr. Richard S. Parker, however, is not the president. Whether somebody wrote to the President and asked his views on this question and signed his name as Richard S. Parker, Mr. Parker not being president of that great organization, we know not; but Mr. Herbert S. Crocker, of Denver, Colo., seems to be president of the American Society of Civil Engineers. There is some inefficiency somewhere. Somebody has made a mistake.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Mississippi who is the mysterious Mr. Parker?

Mr. HARRISON. Nobody seems to knew whether there is such a man as Richard S. Parker.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, there must be. I was just curious to know who Mr. Richard S. Parker is; that is all.

Mr. HARRISON. We have not been able to find out who Mr. Richard S. Parker is. Where the idea came from, nobody knows.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10326) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I did not rise at this particular moment to address myself to those vanishing ghosts to whom the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has alluded, and as to whom the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has sought definite information.

I myself have doubted the propriety of these "letters" which from time to time go forth from the heads of Government addressed to some incidental person living, or to some mythical, imagined authority, to communicate through that indirect, subterranean method an insinuation or intimation against the Congress of the United States.

When this Government was established, and from that time on to the present administration, it had been the course of a regulated authority for the President of the United States, if he wished to communicate with this body, to do so by direct communication. This would in terms disclose respect to Congress, and expecting, as he might, a proper and due obedience to him. The eminent Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] adds the expression "assuming responsibility for his communication." I add to that the facts that we then do take the full responsibility for our subsequent action.

Mr. President, I do not understand this system of indirect, circumlocutory communication through hearsay evidence with the tribunal of the United States Senate.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. LONG. If the President knows of no one who wants the President's opinion, what harm can there be in his getting up some name so as to have it appear that there is somebody who wants it?

Mr. LEWIS. I can not exactly answer the Senator unless I quote him the famous line of the bard which expresses it:

> What's in a name? That which we call a rose
> By any other name would smell as sweet.

[Laughter.]

But, Mr. President, what I wish to declaim against as a mere American citizen proud of his citizenship and one now honored for the second time with membership in this body from a great State, representative of an American people, is that custom which has stolen in and become the habit of those in power of addressing communications, sometimes to a bankers' committee somewhere in our land, sometimes to a personal friend in the State of California or New York, sometimes to the president of an association who we have just been informed has no existence, and in such communication setting forth in long essay and in most elaborate and perplexing discussion conjured problems feared to arise, thus endeavoring either to admonish the Congress to halt in any undertaking or to intimidate Congress against proposed action set forth in some projected program.

Mr. President, if this course of public communication shall be the continuing program of the Government officials, there will be no continuing need of the provision of the Constitution which calls on the President of the United States to address the Congress at appropriate times and to set forth what he feels is necessary to be done for the welfare of the Nation. A President may address himself to a neighbor near by him; or, after the order of the new form of journalism, by "hanging the bell on the cat." The practice can produce great evils and its custom can create contempt for the legislative body.

When this letter appears—it appears for the first time in the public press. It seems to have been prepared by some one for the President—and to come forth at this particular time. It is at the time immediately after there is published in the public papers of America that two sources in the House of Representatives, one presumably represented by what are called the Democrats, one by what are called the Republicans, have under contemplation a system of relief to the American people through the issuing of securities of the Government and floating them before the world on their values and their merits.

At the same time there went forth from the United States Senate a statement that a committee of Members had visited the President and, through the voice of one designated as the leader of the minority in the Senate, presented to the President the view of those gentlemen speaking for the minority. On a day following, I might add, from the majority section of the Senate, the Republicans, there were extended through the two voices representing them, giving their views similarly to that of the House as to the form of necessary relief, namely, the issuing of securities of the Government, obtaining money upon them, and having it applied to relief of States, cities, and communities for the care and preservation of its needy and oppressed citizens. All this in such manner as the laws of the country justify and the needs of our fellow citizens command.

I dare say here in my place that if the President of the United States had not said to these gentlemen that the method and system proposed in some of the forms as suggested met with his approval, and giving to the whole subject his announced acquiescence if the amounts proposed were reduced, there would not have gone farther a single step by House or Senate to the end that was promised in the issuing of these Government securities in behalf of the American needs as they are now expressed.

I ask this: What particular good does the distinguished President of the United States fancy he and his great office achieved by first holding out the hope of refuge to those vast masses and millions who, standing paralyzed in their need and palsied in their hopes, are turning their eyes to the White House in anxiety and to the bodies of the Congress in their doleful and depressed cry for relief, then being lifted up to the light of realization, then their soul beaming in joy, are suddenly by the President cast down and denied their relief? These patient, oppressed people are thus encouraged by the President of the United States in person, and while this is pending there breaks to their vision and strikes on the ears of the Senate and to the eyes of the civilized world the veto of the President of the United States of his own declaration in private letter to an assumed friend of mysterious existence.

The President addresses no message to the Congress, those who, it was understood, were calculating this measure of relief. He addresses no word of warning to the Senate against the measure. He tenders no admonition or advice to his legislative colleagues. He seeks in no wise to aid us. He rather presumes to hold up to the world his condemnation of any system proposed by Congress that it might go out to the country that this combination of ignorance of statesmanship and want of patriotism called the United States Congress has been trifling with the people. That they have presented a theory of relief which to the President seems so senseless and in its execution so ridiculous that he writes the humblest man in the country to give the design his contempt and disdain, rather than to dignify his opposition by sending a message to the Congress of the United States. The author of the project ought, in message to the Congress of his country, to have exposed its faults, if it had any; proposed its remedies, if he sought any, or if he cared to treat with dignity the body of Congress which was now cooperating with him in every form that dignity of manhood and decency of official life commanded.

The official conduct of writing these letters to give the public to understand in what contempt the President holds the Congress and how he disdains any suggestion of remedy from them should come to the end. The President should be called upon to realize and confess that—he may realize that now—at all the time of the session we are seeking to cooperate with him in every form that makes for harmony in the dealings between the agencies of the Government, we being a Union which avoids every form of partisanship. It is wrong for the President to take this form or method of circular action, that compels us to respond against his assault and justify ourselves in the discharge of our duties, which unconsciously on our part may dishonor him in the accusation that he has done that which neither the dignity of his office can license nor the honor of his position justify.

Mr. President, if the President of the United States did not feel that this system which was proposed had any merit in it at the time it was presented to him and which he thus approved—as we show from the record—if, instead of saying, "I differ merely as to the method; I am doubtful as to a part of it, but will recommend it in modified form and give it my approval," he had said, "It can not meet my approval for the lack of a virtue" which he felt it wanted, we would not have gotten to where we would have promised this great class, I may say this army, sir, of the miserable hopefuls. We would not have played the trick upon their fancy, we would not have deluded their expectations, nor would we have been put by the President before the world at large, before the civilized parliaments of earth, as being a body of legislators who, having held out the theme of hope to this people, approved by the President, then denounced and held up as unworthy of consideration, of even conference, by the President—choosing as the avenue of his communication the humblest man—and now the unknown and hidden, rather than descend and condescend to recognizing the contemptible Congress of the United States—sirs, I ask, are we not the equal of the President in government for the conduct of the affairs of our country?

Mr. President, I have been one of those—and I commend to my honorable colleagues who are generous enough to hear me that there are no exceptions in my course—who have offered complete cooperation with whatever the President desired. There has been no time when the Congress of the United States, or any Member of it, has addressed any communication to outside sources for the purpose of having it published, that might reflect on the President, nor have we cast upon the splendid party with which he is aligned any reflection. Therefore I am at a loss to understand what has incited the President to this particular course, which, with some parallels in later days, has no precedent in the history of governmental propriety, it has none in the parallels of honest statesmanship. Mr. President, I leave this portion of my discussion to its own recommendation. I proceed to the question which is being discussed and presented by Senators around us, designated as the tariff. While I bemoan the attitude of the President of the United States on the theme I referred to, I can not bring myself to punish the assault he makes upon the dignity of this body and the contumacy he casts upon the membership of the Congress—by obstructing whatever course he would feel was necessary for the welfare of the whole country, particularly at an hour when its peril is so great and its call and demand are so heavy as should call for statesmanship without partisanship—and obedience without stint.

I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues that we are forgetting that we are in a completely new day. This is not the era of the tariff when there was an issue between one set of gentlemen called Democrats, to whom was ascribed the theory of ancient Mills and Cobden of the English Government, which we speak of as free trade. Nor are we in that other era, when there was created the theory of government pursued by Disraeli and the English Government, after having been recommended by Hamilton of America, called protection, advocated more completely in the American policy by Henry Clay.

We have passed beyond the time when these particular differences, as first expressed from the statesmanship of the older school, can be given application. In the language of the ancient Scripture, we can exclaim:

And behold, I saw a new earth.

In every tariff measure, sir, which you have seen since you have lived, and I speak with deference to the great and distinguished Senator who now presides [Mr. MOSES], and, every Senator who does me the honor to hear me, including my eminent friend and authority on the tariff, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], through all the days in which were created these measures, we were a debtor nation. Every tariff then had to be adjusted upon the basis of such preparation of our instrumentalities and commerce as guarded us against those States which, putting us first in debt, then could invade us by the unlimited form of shipments to our country of their produce, and to that extent shut off the possibilities of our own manufactures.

To-day the conditions are reversed. To-day, while gentlemen are discussing tariff, let it not be forgotten that we are now for the first time under any tariff bill that was ever created or presumed to be created in America, the first creditor nation of the earth. Taking altogether the war debts, the commercial obligations, and debts incurred in individual instances from the different parts of the world, including Asia, South and Central America, and the seven great countries of Europe, there is due to this country, including interest upon the debts, $50,000,000,000.

It will readily be seen, Mr. President, that therefore our method and course in respect to levying duties must be shaped with two objects, one to obtain revenue to maintain the instrumentalities and machinery of the Government, the other to even opportunities of competition between our country and the various countries of the world, and that of the world lands with our own.

Fortunately for us, sir, we are in a position the like of which, having not previously experienced, we can only now experiment, but which test promises us something of complete favor and advantage. You distinguished Members of the Senate whose eyes I see flash great interest for your agricultural section, you will note that the question for you has become very problematic, and you see in some new process some new relief. Therefore I ask, Have we not now reached the point that the Tariff Commission, acting as an agency for the Government, could ascertain the need which America has for any form of product that our Nation does not itself produce, and then, sir, with these duly listed, contract for them from those countries which are in debt to us?

This system will give them credit upon the debts they owe us for the materials which have been proportionately chosen to be used in our land to the extent wherein we do not ourselves produce sufficiently. In that manner we enable our foreign debtors to pay their debts in proportion, and thus give them credit, while in the meantime we lose nothing as against them in competition, sirs. In addition to this we enable these debtor nations to spend their money in purchasing from us such necessities as we have which they need and can not on their own land produce. We bring trade to the United States.

Therefore it will be seen that instead of the old system which we speak of as retaliatory tariff in the form of protection or that which is designated as free trade, we are for the first time upon the basis of a mere exchange with the power of doing it upon the simple treaties of the ancient old line, familiar to us in our old English history:

A this for that; or
A tit for tat.

A system is here expressed by which the question for us now is, on each of the articles presented for consideration, what course should best be taken for the due preservation of them and justice to the others? Let us abandon the theory that in the past we have had certain political creeds or certain political party doctrines which out of a consistency that Emerson well describes as "a hobgoblin of little minds"—that we still cling merely through that system of habit. Let us turn our attention to consider each of these items as best could be in order that we assure advantage to the interest of all those who are concerned.

Mr. President, may I at this point bring to the attention of my colleagues what I feel is a very serious subject and one necessary to be gravely considered. We can not have tariffs of any nature between ourselves and foreign countries without waking some form of retaliation for the attempt to continue the system upon the old prices as they existed at the date the tariff measures were constructed.

The time has now come, Mr. President, as I see it, expressing very deference to my honorable colleagues in any difference that they may have, when America must now be courageous enough, looking toward the peace and harmony of the nations of the world, seeking their friendship for ourselves, to announce that the time is now when all of the debts of those foreign lands should be adjusted in their partial payment now due on the prices of the present day, and assess the products of those lands with which they must pay their obligations, not upon the prices as they were adjusted at the time of the readjustment of the obligations, for if these latter shall continue in their very high prices it will be impossible for any of those lands in this era to rise, survive, and prosper.

By the system we now suggest, Germany will be able to designate her payments and comply with them as they have been laid out in the contract to the full quantity, but upon the basis of the prices which obtain for her materials in the present era of world status. We of the United States would thus behold her obtaining the benefit of a policy generous merely because it is right in the ordinary course of the exchange of affairs concerning which the eminent gentlemen around us have presented their views on the tariff as the basis of their point of view, however differing it might be from any expressed in the past.

Then, sir, let those nations owing us likewise understand from us that the partial payments due us are likewise to be treated upon the same basis of the reductions of the prices of their materials from which they must earn or through which they must pay just exactly as we are compelled to do. We are to consider the reductions in the prices of our materials, the small pay obtained by those who work with their hands, the little that is being obtained as a result of their venture; and as we seek to qualify, modulate, and apply our conditions to this new, though unhappy, situation we should consult the world in the same spirit and lead it on our own behalf, not to a canceling of debts, not to a violation of obligations, but to a treatment of them on such basis as the new change of affairs would justify. By this we may retain their friendship, hold their confidence, and continue in having those who would patronize us wherever opportunity would afford, in that kindness of attitude rather than one of constant retaliation and sullen anger and national revenge.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. With pleasure.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to learn, if I may, just how far the Senator would like to go in the plan he just mentioned. Let us take, for instance, Italy. We made a settlement with her, by which she agreed to pay us between eighteen and nineteen cents on the dollar. Not only that but we carried it over a period of years covering many, many years.

Mr. KING. Seventy years.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is 72, but I was not going to mention the exact number.

Mr. LEWIS. I am not unacquainted with that matter. I am waiting for the Senator to proceed.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator to mean that after giving or forgiving Italy 82 per cent of the actual money that we advanced to her during the war, we now ought to say to Italy, "The goods that you are now making have decreased, from the period at which the obligation was made, 50 per cent, and therefore instead of paying us 18 cents, you may pay us but 9 cents?"

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator does not seem to see, doubtless due perchance to my misfortune in not having conveyed my thought, that I am asking that the payments be made at the present time, and would be in themselves regulated to meet the less prices upon them not as relief but as proportionate payment to the whole; otherwise, as I said, no cancellation, no wiping out, but it is all to be paid. But we give them a chance to pay such proportion of the payment due now as the conditions of their prices permit, leaving the remainder due to be paid under such rising conditions as we hope will come to all of their lands, and likewise our own.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, we gave them long, long years, and we gave them in this settlement the right to have an extension if they could not meet the yearly payments. I do not want the Senator to think I am going to enter into any question of discussion of whether the settlements were just or whether they were overburdensome. I do not, of course, think they were the latter. I think we were very fair when we said to France, "You can pay us back in 40 years at so much a year, and we will forgive you one-half of all the actual cash we advanced to you during the war period, not only of what we advanced before we were in the war but of every dollar that you borrowed during the war and secured from us by way of loans."

What I want to know is whether the Senator really meant, by the words that impress me which he uttered, that we should further approve of cancellations on account of the decrease in the value of products, and that we are to take those decreases and credit the accounts not by the prices of to-day but what they were at the time we made the settlement. I may be mistaken in the idea.

Mr. LEWIS. I am glad the Senator brought out any doubt he had, as I prefer to make it clear. I insist, with reductions in everything they produce and a certain quantity of money due at a certain time, which can not be paid unless they can get something for their products to pay it, that where the conditions are such they can not possibly raise it to the exact date when it is due, the proportion be accepted as a temporary alleviation to-day, because of the lessening of their prices, and leaving that still due to be paid at the first opportunity under conditions having due regard for their conditions as well as our own.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what we did in the settlement with France and all other countries. I do not think there is a nation on the globe that has ever treated her creditors as well as the United States has treated hers, and I am proud of it.

Mr. LEWIS. I belong to the other thought. I feel that the United States went to an extent in those settlements unjustified. We lost sight of our rights to the money, we yielded to those who had no right to make the command, and instead of receiving gratitude and appreciation from them, their vengeance has thrust us through with every spear of retaliation until the body of our great country is bearing still the scars of their blades.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with every word the Senator has uttered. I had reference to our leniency in the settlements. I happened to be a member of the War Debt Settlement Commission. On the basis that we settled, we tried from every known source in the world to find out the actual financial condition of each country, and simply to ask each one to pay what its financial ability at that time would enable it to pay.

Mr. LEWIS. I would like to make clear to the particular Senator, conscious as I am of the great activity he has given—and may I add, meaning no adulation to him—the valued study in the establishment of these different matters of tariff and international debts. May I inform the Senator that I bore some small relation to the matter. I was in France when the officers of the French Government had assembled there to report upon the splendid work of the Senator and his colleagues here. When Baldwin, for Britain, reached England I was serving in a minor capacity at London. I realize that this Nation in those days, according to the prices of those days, extended a generosity which I felt held no parallel in the history of the nations of the world.

But I do not want to disguise from the particular Senator to whom I am speaking now that I have a motive behind my proposition which I wish to clarify to him and to the Senate.

If we can, with justice to those nations, so temporarily reduce the amount of the payment which is due at this time and immediately, according to the prices which they receive, we enable them to take the remainder of the money which they have, exempt them from complete exhaustion, and spend it with the United States. If we can but give them the opportunity to pay us, according to prices now, such proportion and accept the proportion, the remaining sum of money which they may obtain and which I flatter my countrymen we will get in payment for new products, we thus give to our commerce a new life of shipment to export and revive the trade that was languishing and died—a death that has left us in the unhappy condition which the honorable Senator, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, has himself so well pictured as our commercial condition when he presented this revenue bill to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, the Senator feels that a partial payment on their part under the conditions that exist in those countries to-day would be a further favor, but with no idea that there should be a further extension of that favor or that the amounts should be forgiven, but should be paid at a later date?

Mr. LEWIS. Completely, I feel that the money which we allow them to hold and do not require them to pay upon a vast debt will be extended to us in America and enable them to purchase from us the necessities which they command and need for their people, through which we will obtain the benefits in a renewed and revivified commerce of the United States.

I go one step farther. I feel that such a course would tend to awaken a new form of harmony, something of a new communion, of a reviving attitude of brotherhood so far as nations can possibly construct it and in theory maintain it. It is because of that, among other things, and hoping for the least expenditure on armaments and the least as to armies, recognizing the necessity of the national defense, that I feel that all these reliefs would be greatly contributed to and largely developed in our favor if what I suggest could be carried out with propriety to all nations and with practicability to our people.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the junior Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I ask my learned friend if he perceives anything in the attitude of the American people to-day, particularly as their attitude is manifested in the Senate of the United States, that looks with any degree of tolerance upon the suggestion which he has made? In other words, does he not find a reactionary spirit upon the part of Congress and in many of the American people under the influence of which we are determined to erect barriers prohibitive of foreign trade and commerce? In 1918, 1919, 1920, and 1921 our foreign commerce was approximately from $12,000,000,000 to $14,000,000,000. For the last calendar year it scarcely aggregated $5,000,000,000, and for this calendar year it will perhaps be less than $4,000,000,000.

Has not the Senator seen manifested here in the Senate a spirit hostile to trade and commerce? Has he not found here a spirit which prompts us to pass measures that will further restrict our exports, as well as our imports, and ultimately eventuate in the erection of a Chinese wall around the United States, so that we will have but little if any trade and commerce with the rest of the world?

The Senator now is pleading for a policy which ought to commend itself to humanitarians and to statesmen and to those who believe in some sort of world solidarity, but does not the Senator find in the United States and in the Senate something that repels the suggestion which he makes and a sentiment in favor of locking the United States in a sort of water-tight compartment?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I conceive in my acquaintance no gentleman who has appraised with more accuracy the attitude of foreign nations than has my eminent friend the junior Senator from Utah. His late travels through Russia, extending up to the Holy Land, and his touch with the great commercial nations of Europe lately, qualify him to a remarkable degree, to an extent far surpassing that which blesses others of us; yet I can answer him by saying that it is my judgment that the conditions to which he alludes were really brought about by the foreign nations themselves; and I now will give him the schedule.

At the close of the World War there came a time when we could demand some payment of the debts they owed us. We were surprised, and I am sure our citizens were horrified, that eminent statesmen of foreign lands would arise in their public places and denounce us as though we were highway robbers; that we had become of late brigands on the road of civilization. In one of the parliaments we were designated as "Uncle Shylock" because of the mere request, and in another it was said that we were seeking to rob their government; that we had come into the cause of the war in order to make money of them. To the young generation in those nations we were held up as unworthy of the respect of mankind and of those who would give voice to that Christian thought that my eminent friend, Senator KING, so aptly describes.

When this occurred, Mr. President, and there was disclosed this attitude and this unhappy temper of enmity to those who had been so generous to them—so generous as not only to afford them our treasure without limit but contributing the streams of blood of our dying soldiers—falling upon distant fields in their behalf, all to their service and rescue—this conduct of ingratitude naturally awakened some sentiment of response, which took the form of retaliation on the part of Americans, and it may be that the courses they adopted in the forms of legislation, to which my eminent friend alludes, took on some atmosphere of the expression of that natural resentment, and may have gone so far as to have worked the result which my eminent Senator fears he sees in the present impending condition of our Nation. But this much I add, that if now we can disclose to the people of these nations, to their younger generations who have come forth since the World War, no longer tinctured with the hate that seemed to embitter and curdle the spirit of their ancestors, we will awaken in these a spirit of approval, one of kindly cooperation and, to the extent that it can be aroused anew, that which is due us of some legitimate cooperation in the friendships of mankind and the justice of nations.

Mr. President, I have occupied more time than was my intent. I wanted to throw forth two suggestions. One was what I thought was the unfair and indefensible attitude of the President of the United States to his colleagues who had been serving with him so faithfully and without the slightest dissent of party politics or any form, sir, of opposition whenever he sought their cooperation. I gave an expression of the thing which I felt that the letter or promulgation that went abroad to the world was addressed to some private character who seems to be so insignificant or unknown to humanity as not to be located in a directory of any civilized community, and that nobody at this time can through any form of investigation identify. But, apart from all that, sir, it seems to me that the President sought to mantle most completely, may I say, the contempt and the attitude of infinite smallness he bore to our body by choosing the least and most contemptible source to which to express his feeling of design against anything which we were contemplating to perform.

Having expressed that view, sir, I then moved on to bring to the attention of my honorable colleagues the final thought. It is, sir, this: Eminent gentlemen here may discuss the matter of the different schedules of the political tariff; I am not qualified to do so. I belong to a school inwardly that feels that the tariff question is a business one in this era and should be regulated as rates of the water and light companies are regulated, on the one hand, and freight rates on the other; all according to the subject matter under consideration. I observe one of my brother colleagues who served in the House with me. He will not forget that from the State of Texas there was a lovely gentleman by the name of Kleberg. With him was a colonel, who represented the San Antonio district. May I be so bold, sir, as to say that you, Mr. Vice President, in your genial service, filled with great and often brilliant achievements in your service in the other House, you will perhaps recall the colonel who represented the San Antonio district.

Mr. KING. It was Mr. Slayden.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator; his name was Slayden. They had not been able to agree to a tariff on wool. Colonel Slayden received an inflaming letter, which read:

> You are ruining yourself; you will never be elected again because of your refusal to vote for a tariff on wool; the sheepmen are done with you. I am your old friend and advising you of the danger you have put yourself in.
> (Signed) EZRA WILLIAMS.

I think Representative Kleberg and the colonel were greatly disturbed and came before us in the committee, and their perturbation was so great that all of us felt keenly that they should suffer so much in mind. But in a few minutes he came back before us radiant in countenance, and he held in his hand a telegram which read:

> Don't pay no attention to my letter on the tariff. I just sold my sheep.
>
> EZRA WILLIAMS.

[Laughter.]

The tariff had become so personal that I think of the shade of poor Hancock walking the avenues of life throughout our land and recalling that in the day when he ran for the Presidency he had uttered the expression and the theory that the tariff was a "local issue," which buried him in the estimate of my eminent friend and brother from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] and of all those who believed the tariff was a national construction. Now as we look upon the situation to-day and gather it as it has manifested itself throughout this debate we are compelled to salute the ghost of this eminent dead and recall him as a wondrous philosopher.

Mr. President, I conclude; I have threatened to do so; I shall now carry out the threat. I feel in this discussion my eminent friends on both sides of this issue are compelled to surrender any conviction of tariff doctrines to the purpose that they are called on to provide revenue to accomplish that of which we hear so much, namely, to "balance the Budget."

I know Senators have heard me allude to the expression. I have been fascinated by it; it has been a creative invention of late; it has served all purposes; it has established a virtue of statesmanship in the men who pronounce themselves on the public rostrum as favoring "the balancing of the Budget," as it has brought condemnation upon the heads of those who decline to favor it. Some system may be suggested to do what is called "balancing the Budget," but neither of the eminent gentlemen, the one who may be hoping for the bright glory of its fulfillment and the other, who may fear the disobedience of it, knows what the "balancing of a budget is." Neither knows what the "Budget" has in it. Neither knows what would balance it. Why? Because the President has not at any time sent any correct estimates to the Houses of Congress. Not that he would mislead them, but those who give him counsel and advice which he is called on to follow did mislead him. There was never a time when there was an accurate figure by which they would know what is in the Budget. There never was a time when they could ever know what particular figures would balance the Budget. Not only has the Budget remained unbalanced, but the administration continues unbalanced.

That unhappy unbalancing, may it please you, sir, has put us in such a state of general uncertainty that we are now hanging, as it were, upon branches that sway to and fro with the winds of those who lift up their voices and cry out with melodious and mellifluous expression, "Balance the Budget." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I realize that as fast as we do one thing there is a demand that we should do another. May I be pardoned, sir, for a personal reference? During the World War, as I was bringing home some soldiers of my command, I was torpedoed in the sea. With others accompanying me, I was put in a sanitarium. Next door was a sanitarium which seemingly had been that of a specialist for lung disease. It happened that some distinguished statesman of Switzerland had died from a lung malady in that sanitarium, which seemed to have very much disturbed the reputation of the sanitarium. It was taunted very generally upon the failure of the cure, when the next day there came out a large placard in front of the building with the following complete excuse and exoneration:

> It was not the cough that carried him off,
> But the coffin they carried him off in.

[Laughter.]

Unfortunately for this administration, I desire to say that they have had a great many men who have gone up and down this country "coughing out" and "coughing up" their different forms of malediction against everybody who could not agree with anything that they thought would prosper them politically; I desire to tell them it is not their cough that is going to carry them on, it is their political coffin they are carrying themselves off in. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, despite that attitude of contentious mind, I say to my colleagues we should stand before the country now with a willingness to take the measure the President of the United States recommends to us—not that we agree with it—not that we accept the suggestion of wisdom—profoundly as it is uttered—that surrounds it—but because the President has held up to American citizenship that his colleagues in service—the Congress—are of such obstinate character, and so lacking in patriotism in the service of their country, that they obstruct and impede every effort he makes that looks to the common object of the welfare of their country called the balancing of the Budget.

Therefore we accept the recommendation coming directly from him or from his agents of the Treasury who come before this Finance Committee, hard worked, struggling in order to achieve its object, and representing the President's policy, setting forth that which is embodied in the bill. We undertake to carry it out on the theory that the President sends forth to the world and to his Nation that this particular system he proposes will achieve the object.

In this way, sir, we serve our purpose. We also avoid the charge that either for partisan purposes or personal gain we in anywise obstruct anything the President undertakes, and by our support of this measure we prove again the patriotism of this body and that of our colleagues, who without partisanship in any form or in any way have at all times yielded to that which they felt would serve the need of our country.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. CUTTING. The Senator was a distinguished Member of this body during the World War. Does he remember that all other considerations were at that time sacrificed to balancing the Budget? Does he remember any such propaganda at the time of any national crisis?

Mr. LEWIS. I reply to the eminent Senator from New Mexico by saying it is true I was a Member of this body. I can not certify that I was what he delights me with the thought of, that I was a "distinguished Member"; but, coming from such an eminent source, I accept the appellation with a sense of gratitude. [Laughter.] Nevertheless, I agree with my friend, Senator CUTTING, that during those days all these around us who served in those critical hours will accede, and all admit, that each occasion called for appropriate action. There never was at any time in my public career, either in the House or here in the Senate, that I can recall a specific demand upon the body that notwithstanding however high we had built this mountain of indebtedness, Ossa upon Pelion, we should "balance it" by levying taxes upon the people in every way, wherever possible, sufficiently to drain them even to the blood of their existence, necessary to "balance" that great heap to the evil of the peak to which it has reached.

I never heard the expression before "balancing the Budget," applicable to ourselves. It was an English doctrine, and a method in England oftentimes used; and, of course, I can understand that there are those in our Government who, from long service in England, and services to that country as well as residence and private and financial engagements, would still have a preference for these expressions on behalf of England as coming from English statesmanship. While I can not myself subscribe to the doctrine of their superiority, I can sympathize with the gentleman who feels he will gain the approval in far-off distances of old friends with whom he was commingled and allied, financially and personally. [Laughter.] This to be done by adopting whatever catalogue of expression they have in their statesmanship as a proof of its superiority over the obnoxious methods of American statesmanship.

As an American I hark back to where we were and I remain where I am. That which in America is necessary for her people I desire executed according to the American system.

Mr. President, I appreciate the courtesy of the Senate in allowing me to wander so far afield from the first thought that was my only object to express. I express to the Senate my thanks and say that I feel that by carrying out our duties in the best manner we can, as directed by the President, we shall be able to defend ourselves against the charge of abandoning our party, as we have done in order to serve the President and his policies, and we will prevent the President from writing another letter to the wraith and ghost of some imaginary human being, in which we shall again be excoriated or held up as unworthy of any further attention. We will prove to the public at large our devotion to the purposes set forth, and demonstrate that we in this body on both sides are not for party, not for politics, but for the Nation.

It was unnecessary for the 11 gentlemen of self-proclaimed eminence who yesterday met in New York to admonish the Senate to drop its politics. Sirs, we remember that it was some of those gentlemen and their colleagues who in their politics have brought this country to the miserable state to which it has been compelled to descend. It is these and their clients and captains who have worked upon our United States the deplorable reputation that stains its honor before the world. Their admonitions to us were wholly unnecessary, as they are unprofitable. We turn to those eminent gentlemen in their financial malaria and plague of head enlargement who assembled in New York and say to them, in the words of the Scripture, "Physician, heal thyself!"

Expressing my thanks and appreciation to the Senate, I say it pleases me to announce to the world everywhere that whatever our course shall be, as it has been in the past it shall continue for the future to be, for our country, for the welfare of all its people, as we praise Heaven we are Americans.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, now that the Senator from Illinois has made the remarkable address that he has, and other references have been made to the President's letter to Mr. Richard S. Parker, I ask that the letter be published in the RECORD at this time, following his remarks.

If I had time, I should like to address the Senate now on the effect of tariffs on imports under the present tariff law. I may have a chance to do so later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Times of Monday, May 23, 1932]

HOOVER'S WARNING ON PUBLIC WORKS BONDS

WASHINGTON, May 22.—President Hoover's letter to President Parker, of the American Society of Civil Engineers, read as follows:

MAY 21, 1932.

RICHARD S. PARKER,
President American Society of Civil Engineers,
New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR MR. PARKER: I am in receipt of your kind letter of May 19, and I have also the presentation of the subcommittee of the society suggesting that the depression can be broken by a large issue of Federal Government bonds to finance a new program of huge expansion of "public-works" construction, in addition to the already large programs now provided for in the current Budgets. The same proposals have been made from other quarters and have been given serious consideration during the past few days.

The back of the depression can not be broken by any single government undertaking. That can only be done with the cooperation of business, banking, industry, and agriculture in conjunction with the Government.

RELIEF PROGRAM OUTLINED

The aid the Government may give includes:

(a) The quick, honest balancing of the Federal Budget through drastic reduction of less necessary expenses and the minimum increase in taxes.

(b) The avoidance of issue of further Treasury securities as the very keystone of national and international confidence upon which all employment rests.

(c) The continuation of the work of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which has overcome the financial strain on thousands of small banks, releasing credit to their communities; the strengthening of building and loan associations; the furnishing of credit to agriculture; the protection of trustee institutions; and the support of financial stability of the railways.

(d) The expansion of credit by the Federal reserve banks.

(e) The organized translation of these credits into actualities for business and public bodies.

(f) Unceasing effort at sound strengthening of the foundations of agriculture.

(g) The continuation of such public works in aid to unemployment as do not place a strain on the taxpayer and do not necessitate Government borrowing.

(h) Continuation of national, community, and individual efforts in relief of distress.

(i) The introduction of the 5-day week in Government, which would save the discharge of 100,000 employees and would add 30,000 to the present list.

(j) The passage of the home loan discount bank legislation, which would protect home owners from foreclosure and would furnish millions of dollars of employment in home improvement without cost to the Treasury.

(k) Financial aid by means of loans from the Reconstruction Corporation to such States as, due to the long strain, are unable to continue to finance distress relief.

(l) The extension of the authority of the Reconstruction Corporation, not only in a particular I called attention to last December—that is, loans on sound security to industry, where they would sustain and expand employment—but also, in view of the further contraction of credit, to increase its authority to expand the issue of its own securities up to $3,000,000,000 for the purpose of organized aid to "income-producing" work throughout the Nation, both of public and private character.

OBJECTIONS TO PROPOSALS

1. The vice in that segment of the proposals made by your society and others for further expansion of "public works" is that they include public works of remote usefulness; they impose unbearable burdens upon the taxpayer; they unbalance the Budget and demoralize Government credit. A larger and far more effective relief to unemployment at this stage can be secured by increased aid to "income-producing works." I wish to emphasize this distinction between what for purposes of this discussion we may term "income-producing works" (also referred to as "self-liquidating works") on the one hand and nonproductive "public works" on the other.

By "income-producing works" I mean such projects of States, counties, and other subdivisions as waterworks, toll bridges, toll tunnels, docks, and any other such activities which charge for their service and whose earning capacity provides a return upon the investment. With the return of normal times the bonds of such official bodies based upon such projects can be disposed of to the investing public, and thus make the intervention of the Reconstruction Corporation purely an emergency activity.

I include in this class aid to established industry where it would sustain and increase employment, with the safeguard that loans for these purposes should be made on sound security and the proprietors of such industries should provide a portion of the capital. Nonproductive "public works," in the sense of the term here used, include public buildings, highways, streets, river and harbor improvement, military and naval construction, etc., which bring no income and comparatively little relief to unemployment.

FORMS OF RELIEF CONTRASTED

2. I can perhaps make this distinction clear by citing the example of the recent action of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the matter of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., on one hand, and the recent bill passed by the House of Representatives for increased road building on the other. The railroad company applied to the Reconstruction Corporation for a loan of $55,000,000 to help finance a fund of over $68,000,000 needed to electrify certain of its lines. By so doing it would employ directly and indirectly for one year more than 28,000 men, distributed over 20 different States. An arrangement was concluded by which the Reconstruction Corporation undertook to stand behind the plan to the extent of $27,000,000, the railway company finding the balance.

This $27,000,000 is to be loaned on sound securities and will be returned, capital and interest, to the corporation. The Reconstruction Corporation is acting as agent to make available otherwise timid capital for the Pennsylvania Railroad in providing employment. There is no charge upon the taxpayer.

On the other hand, the proposal of the House of Representatives is to spend $132,000,000 for subsidies to the States for construction of highways. This would be a direct charge on the taxpayer. The total number of men to be directly employed is estimated at 35,000 and indirectly 20,000 more. In other words, by this action we would give employment to only 55,000 men at the expense by the Government of $132,000,000, which will never be recovered.

In the one instance, we recover the money advanced through the Reconstruction Corporation, we issue no Government bonds, we have no charge on the taxpayer. In the other instance, we have not only a direct cost to the taxpayer but also a continuing maintenance charge; and, furthermore, the highways in many sections have now been expanded beyond immediate public need.

BUDGET FACTOR EMPHASIZED

3. These proposals of huge expansion of public works have a vital relation to balancing the Federal Budget and to the stabilizing of national credit. The financing of income-producing works by the Reconstruction Corporation is an investment operation, requires no congressional appropriation, does not unbalance the Budget, is not a drain upon the Treasury, does not involve the direct issue of Government bonds, does not involve added burdens upon the taxpayer, either now or in the future. It is an emergency operation which will liquidate itself with the return of the investor to the money markets.

The proposal to build nonproductive public works of the category I have described necessitates making increased appropriations by the Congress. These appropriations must be financed by immediate increased taxation or by the issuance of Government bonds. Whatever the method employed, they are, inescapably, a burden upon the taxpayer. If such a course is adopted beyond the amounts already provided in the Budget now before Congress for the next fiscal year, it will upset all possibility of balancing the Budget; it will destroy confidence in Government securities and make for the instability of the Government, which, in result, will deprive more people of employment than will be gained.

HUGE PUBLIC WORKS OUTLAY NOW

4. I have for many years advocated the speeding up of public works in times of depression as an aid to business and unemployment. That has been done upon a huge scale and is proceeding at as great a pace as fiscal stability will warrant. All branches of Government—Federal, State, and municipal—have greatly expanded their public works, and have now reached a stage where they have anticipated the need for many such works for a long time to come. Therefore, the new projects which might be undertaken are of even more remote usefulness.

From January, 1930, to July 1, 1932, the Federal Government will have expended $1,500,000,000 on public works. The Budget for the next fiscal year carries a further $575,000,000 of such expenditures (compared with about $250,000,000 normal) and includes all the items I have felt are justified by sound engineering and sound finance. Thus by the end of next year the Federal Government will have expended over $2,000,000,000 on public works, which represents an increase over normal of perhaps $1,200,000,000.

Thus we have largely anticipated the future and have rendered further expansion beyond our present program of very remote usefulness and certainly not justified for some time to come, even were there no fiscal difficulties. They represent building of a community beyond its necessities. We can not thus squander ourselves into prosperity.

MANY PROJECTS REQUIRE YEARS

5. A still further and overriding reason for not undertaking such programs of further expansions of Federal public works is evident if we examine the individual projects which might be undertaken from an engineering and economic point of view. The Federal public works now authorized by law cover works which it was intended to construct over a long term of years and embrace several projects which were not of immediate public usefulness. In any event, the total of such authorized projects still incomplete on the 1st of July will amount to perhaps $1,300,000,000.

If we deduct from this at once the budgeted program for the next fiscal year—$575,000,000—we leave, roughly, $725,000,000 of such authorized works which would be open for action. If we examine these projects in detail, we find great deductions must be made from this sum. Construction of many projects physically requires years for completion, such as naval vessels, buildings, canalization of rivers, etc., and therefore as an engineering necessity this sum could only be expended over four or five years; a portion of the projects not already started will require legal and technical preparation and therefore could not be brought to the point of employment of labor during the next year; a portion of these authorized projects are outside the continental United States and do not contribute to the solution of our problem; a portion are in localities where there is little unemployment; a portion are in the District of Columbia, where we already have a large increase in program for the next fiscal year, and where no additional work could be justified. A portion are of remote utility and are not justified, such as extension of agricultural acreage at the present time.

GREAT EXPANSION HELD IMPOSSIBLE

Deducting all these cases from the actual list of authorized Federal public works, it will be found that there is less than $100,000,000 (and this is doubtful) which could be expended during the next fiscal year beyond the program in the Budget. That means the employment of, say, less than 40,000 men. Thus the whole of these grandiose contentions of possible expansion of Federal public works fall absolutely to the ground for these reasons if there were no other.

If it is contemplated that we legislate more authorizations of new and unconsidered projects by Congress we shall find ourselves confronted by a logrolling process which will include dredging of mud creeks, building of unwarranted post offices, unprofitable irrigation projects, duplicate highways, and a score of other unjustifiable activities.

6. There is still another phase of this matter to which I would like to call attention. Employment in public works is largely transitory. It does not have a follow-up of continued employment, as is the case with "income-producing works." But of even more importance than this, the program I have proposed gives people employment in all parts of the country in their normal jobs under normal conditions at the normal place of abode, tends to reestablish normal processes in business and industry, and will do so on a much larger scale than the projects proposed in the so-called "public-works" program.

BALANCING OF BUDGET VITAL

7. To sum up, it is generally agreed that the balancing of the Federal Budget and unimpaired national credit are indispensable to the restoration of confidence and to the very start of economic recovery. The administration and Congress have pledged themselves to this end. A "public-works program," such as is suggested by your committee and by others, through the issuance of Federal bonds creates at once an enormous further deficit.

What is needed is the return of confidence and a capital market through which credit will flow in the thousand rills with its result of employment and increased prices. That confidence will be only destroyed by action in these directions. These channels will continue clogged by fears if we continue attempts to issue large amounts of Government bonds for purposes of nonproductive works.

Such a program as these huge Federal loans for "public works" is a fearful price to pay in putting a few thousand men temporarily at work and dismissing many more thousands of others from their present employment. There is vivid proof of this since these proposals of public works financed by Government bonds were seriously advanced a few days ago. Since then United States Government bonds have shown marked weakness on the mere threat. And it is followed at once by a curtailment of the ability of States, municipalities, and industry to issue bonds, and thus a curtailment of activities which translate themselves into decreased employment.

It will serve no good purpose and will fool no one to try to cover appearances by resorting to a so-called "extraordinary Budget." That device is well known. It brought the governments of certain foreign governments to the brink of financial disaster. It means a breach of faith to holders of all Government securities, an unsound financial program, and a severe blow to returning confidence, and further contraction of economic activities in the country.

What you want and what I want is to restore normal employment. I am confident that if the program I have proposed to the Congress is expeditiously completed and we have the cooperation of the whole community, we will attain the objective for which we have been searching so long.

Yours faithfully,

HERBERT HOOVER.

Mr. CUTTING obtained the floor.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUTTING. I do.

Mr. WHEELER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield for that purpose?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Bankhead	Cutting	Kean	Sheppard
Barbour	Davis	Kendrick	Shipstead
Barkley	Dickinson	Keyes	Shortridge
Blaine	Dill	King	Smith
Borah	Fess	La Follette	Smoot
Bratton	Fletcher	Lewis	Steiwer
Brookhart	Frazier	Logan	Stephens
Broussard	George	Long	Thomas, Idaho
Bulkley	Glass	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Bulow	Goldsborough	McNary	Townsend
Byrnes	Hale	Moses	Tydings
Capper	Harrison	Neely	Vandenberg
Caraway	Hastings	Norris	Wagner
Carey	Hatfield	Nye	Walcott
Cohen	Hawes	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Connally	Hayden	Patterson	Walsh, Mont.
Coolidge	Hebert	Pittman	Watson
Copeland	Hull	Reed	Wheeler
Costigan	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Eighty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from New Mexico is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me in order to offer an amendment?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HULL. I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and lie on the table.

Mr. HULL. I ask to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 244, line 9, it is proposed to amend by inserting after the word "articles," the following additional paragraph:

> The Government of the United States agrees not to increase the protective tariff above the present level for a period of two years, or to create new barriers or impediments to trade, provided other nations shall pursue a like policy.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I was much interested to hear the enlightened discourse of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], especially that part in which he referred to the "balancing of the Budget," that sacred phrase to which apparently we must subordinate every other consideration, including the health and life of our people. A representative of the American Federation of Labor who appeared recently before a subcommittee of the Committee on Manufactures told us that there were two other "b's" which were even more important than balancing the Budget, and that those were "bread and butter."

If we attempt to get any enlightenment from the administration, we are faced, first and foremost, with this question of balancing the Budget.

When a public-works program was suggested to the Secretary of the Treasury the other day, he replied to the request for comment, "I will say that there is no great amount of enthusiasm for an unbalanced Budget and a pork-barrel plan at the Treasury."

When the Secretary of the Interior took the opportunity the other day to talk about the depression, he insisted on the great value it would have to the babies and young children of the United States.

When the President is asked about a public-works program, he talks about banks and railroads and great industries in trouble. I have no intention to-day of dealing in detail with the letter published this morning in the press by the President, addressed to Richard S. Parker, president American Society of Civil Engineers, New York, N. Y. I do not know that it makes a great deal of difference to whom the letter was written, but it so happens that this gentleman is not the president of the American Society of Civil Engineers; that, as most well-informed citizens know, the president of the American Society of Civil Engineers is Mr. Herbert S. Crocker, of Denver, Colo. But I think the fact that the President wrote to Mr. Parker as president of the American Society of Civil Engineers acknowledging the receipt of his "kind letter of May 19," and saying, "I have also the presentation of the subcommittee of the society suggesting that the depression can be broken by a large issue of Federal governmental bonds," is perhaps symbolical of the attitude which the President has shown toward the unemployment situation from the time when it first began.

If it were not for the high position which he holds, I can not conceive that any human being would have the slightest interest at this stage of the game in any statement made by President Hoover. Nevertheless, the sounding board of the White House is a powerful instrument to appeal to the country. I suppose there is no man on this floor who does not receive letters every day asking him for God's sake to give up this business of partisan squabbling and support the great program laid down by the President for the rehabilitation of the country.

While I do not mean to deal with this statement in any detail, because it is full of figures which seem to be entirely erroneous, and to deal with it in detail would require more time than I have been able to give to it up to this moment, it seems to me that a few general considerations might be stated now on the floor of the Senate.

Perhaps those of us who believe in a public-works program should be gratified by seeing that the President at last has come out attacking it. That, perhaps, is the first stage in a series of mental processes with which we have become familiar in the past. Perhaps I should say it is the second stage. The first stage has usually been the ignoring of any program. The second stage has been the attack, and the third stage, capitulation and surrender. Then comes the fourth stage, in which all credit for the constructive reforms which have been accomplished, and which have been opposed for years, is claimed by the occupant of the White House.

In this particular case, however—and I am trying to measure my words—the President's attitude seems to be almost unique in history. For the past 15 years Mr. Hoover has been one of the leading advocates of the principle of expanding public works in time of business depression as a fundamental remedial measure. In February, 1923, after he had served as chairman of a commission on unemployment appointed by President Harding, Mr. Hoover, who was then Secretary of Commerce, wrote to Senator Frelinghuysen and to Representative Zihlman in support of the Frelinghuysen-Zihlman bill, a bill which stated in its preamble:

> Whereas in the expansion of public works, at all such times, lies a natural and fundamental remedy for unemployment; and
> Whereas it is desirable that the Federal Government shall have power to acquire and tabulate for public use the information necessary to initiate and carry out this policy; therefore.

And there followed a bill providing for the appointment by the President of a commission of three "to prepare preliminary surveys or plans * * * so that work may be commenced and prosecuted when the next business depression occurs and when an appropriation becomes available therefor."

That was the bill which was approved by Mr. Hoover in his letter to Senator Frelinghuysen and Representative Zihlman.

On November 21, 1928, just two weeks after his election, at the request of President-elect Hoover, Gov. Ralph O. Brewster, of Maine, set forth fully in an address to the conference of governors in New Orleans what became known at once throughout the country as the Hoover plan, namely, the proposal of a gigantic nation-wide construction reserve, to be used in times of unemployment and overproduction to relieve the unemployment and stabilize business by the expansion of public works.

Those of us who think back to that time will remember the occasion very well. Yet it requires a certain amount of effort. I saw to-day a copy of the Literary Digest of December 8, 1928, which gave its first three pages to this so-called Hoover plan. Three billion dollars was suggested as the proper sum for a bond issue to carry it out.

The Literary Digest heading was "Hoover's Plan to Keep the Dinner Pail Full." The opening sentence is as follows:

The abolition of poverty—or a job for every worker—was more than once depicted by Mr. Hoover during his campaign as the great aim of the American economic system. Now his proposal to create a $3,000,000,000 reserve fund to be used for public construction work so as to ward off unemployment in lean years is hailed as a step toward that goal, although there are many who predict that the plan will not progress far before it collides with formidable obstacles in its path.

The Literary Digest at that time, of course, was not in a position to prophesy that the most formidable obstacle in its path would be the opposition of the President of the United States.

According to the Literary Digest of that date, the Magazine of Business stated:

Mr. Hoover will get out and push, where President Coolidge has been content to sit at the wheel and steer.

William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, is quoted in the same article as saying:

The proposal is the most important announcement on wages made in a decade—the first definite movement to systematize wages and employment.

The Chicago Evening Post is quoted as saying:

Here is evidence that our next President will not passively accept conditions long deplored, merely because they have long existed.

"The Hoover plan is a step in the right direction," says the St. Louis Star. "It is a logical development of modern economic thought," affirms the Philadelphia Public Record, which states, in closing the editorial:

While the proposal is complex in detail, the principle is simple enough. Joseph made it work in the matter of Egypt's food supply several thousand years ago. Why shouldn't our highly organized society make it work now in industry?

According to the Literary Digest of the date I have mentioned, there came a unanimous chorus of approval, not only from the governors who heard the plan set forth, but from public opinion all over the country. So far as the Literary Digest reports, there was not a dissenting vote anywhere in this Nation.

Now, what is the record, Mr. President? Having failed to take any further step toward the reconstruction fund of $3,000,000,000, which was advertised as the "Hoover plan," after failing to recognize the depression for almost a year after it began, the President asked Congress to appropriate from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000 for public works. I have forgotten the exact amount which he received. Perhaps some Senator will enlighten me. My memory is that it was something like $116,000,000.

This morning the President gave out a 12-plank program making a distinction between "nonproductive" and "self-liquidating" public works. Instead of giving a job to every man he advises a continued reliance upon local charitable funds, when all our experience and the evidence of competent authorities has shown that those sources have been exhausted long ago.

I do not know how the President expects to deal with the problem of unemployment. It seems to me that if we take his statements at their face value he has left the unemployed population of the country no alternative except starvation revolt.

I wish to quote a few words from the President's statement:

The vice in that segment of the proposals made by your society and others for further expansion of "public works" is that they include public works of remote usefulness; they impose unbearable burdens upon the taxpayers; they unbalance the Budget; and demoralize Government credit.

That is the main point which he makes and with which I shall deal in a moment. In detail he says that "the best way in which we could remedy the situation is by following the example of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the matter of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., in which money was loaned to finance a private enterprise which presumably in the course of time will make enough profit to repay to the Government the sum advanced.

I wonder, without going into any other phases of the matter, whether there are enough projects which even the President would call self-liquidating to really alter the unemployment situation in the country. If so, no evidence has been presented to that effect. The statement has been made, and is made by the President in this message, that there are not sufficient governmental projects which have already been approved to change the situation. Of course, from that particular point of view it does seem to me that at a time like this to loan money to subsidize private investment is something which is liable to lead to more scandal, to more favoritism, to more ultimate loss, than any project which is concerned with public projects alone.

Later on the President states that "these proposals have a vital relation to balancing the Federal Budget and to the stabilizing of national credit." He continues, referring to the course of building nonproductive public works, as he describes them:

If such a course is adopted beyond the amounts already provided in the Budget now before Congress for the next fiscal year, it will upset all possibility of balancing the Budget, it will destroy confidence in Government securities, and make for the instability of the Government which, in result, will deprive more people of employment than will be gained.

Surely at this date, Mr. President, it is not necessary to remind the country that the main difficulty which we confront is a matter of the revival of purchasing power. Sound business will not borrow money to finance projects from which there is no chance of getting any returns. Until the purchasing power revives there is no way in which business can possibly revive. Investment can not begin again until that purchasing power is revived, which means filling the great gap left by 8,000,000 to 10,000,000 unemployed citizens.

To my mind that matter completely takes precedence of any mythical necessity for balancing the Budget. Private enterprise does not balance its budget annually if by that is meant the financing of permanent improvements out of the current revenues of the year.

Furthermore, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] pointed out a short while ago, under the analogy of war-time conditions—and the President himself admitted that this is a crisis and should therefore be treated as such—the balancing of the Budget is of purely secondary concern, secondary to reaching the objectives which the country needs to reach.

Then the President says, in substance, there is already a hugh public-works outlay. He continues:

We have largely anticipated the future and have rendered further expansion beyond our present program of very remote usefulness and certainly not justified for some time to come, even though there were no fiscal difficulties.

His fifth point is similar:

A still further and overriding reason for not undertaking such programs of further expansions of Federal public works is evident if we examine the individual projects which might be undertaken from an engineering and economic point of view. The Federal public works now authorized by law cover works which it was intended to construct over a long term of years and embrace several projects which were not of immediate public usefulness.

Mr. President, I can say in that regard that there are a great many Federal public works which could be undertaken at once and whose usefulness no one could question. The report of the United States Bureau of Public Roads in 1930 shows projects of 48,000 miles of Federal-aid highways in every State in the Union which could be given a permanent surface at an expenditure of $1,200,000,000. These roads could be completed and the surface protected while at the same time employing scores of thousands of men.

Take the question of grade crossings, a project which I understand experts say employs more labor in proportion to the total expenditure than any other kind of highway work. There are 210,000 unprotected railway grade crossings at the present time which could be eliminated. It has been estimated that one-third of those—70,000—could be wiped out at a cost of approximately $3,500,000,000. It is obvious that projects of that sort could be carried out almost immediately, certainly with the simplest kind of planning and an exceedingly simple form of contract.

In addition to these particular proposals we have the questions of new highways, of reforestation, of flood-control projects, river and harbor improvements, and public buildings. Is it conceivable that there are not billions upon billions of dollars' worth of work that can be done with profit to the country which come into one or the other class?

The President said further:

> There is still another phase of this matter to which I would like to call attention. Employment in public works is largely transitory. It does not have a follow-up of continued employment as is the case with income-producing works.

It seems to me that is something with which we all agree. A public-works program of this kind is not advocated as something which will proceed indefinitely on the same scale. It is a bridge to carry us over the gap which exists now. If extra purchasing power can be created it is no argument to say that when we restore the normal trend of business conditions we shall have to adopt an entirely different system, a far more fundamental system for the future.

The President continues:

> It is generally agreed that the balancing of the Federal Budget and unimpaired national credit is indispensable to the restoration of confidence and to the very start of economic recovery. The administration and Congress have pledged themselves to this end. A public-works program, such as is suggested by your committee and others, through the issuance of Federal bonds creates at once an enormous further deficit.

I do not know whether at this stage of the proceedings it is necessary to argue for the principle of public works. The national debt which threatens us would not in itself be unduly onerous were it not for the shrinkage of prices, the shrinkage of incomes, and the depression in business conditions. If we expand activity through a public-works program or through any of the other ways which have been suggested—none of which, however, are as immediate as a public-works program—the activity which will be created in the country will far more than overbalance the new charges which may be incurred by adding something—a pittance—to the national debt.

So far this session of Congress has been most amenable to every project which the President has set before us. We have voted for the moratorium, for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the Glass-Steagall banking bill. Not one of them has remedied the situation. Not one of them has checked the downward trend of business, the fall of security and commodity prices, or the rise in unemployment.

We say 8,000,000 to 10,000,000 of our citizens are wholly unemployed. That does not cover the situation. There are probably just as many more who are partially employed, working only two or three days a week.

The present depression has cost the laboring people of the country not less than $25,000,000,000 and the business men not less than $100,000,000,000, the total loss amounting to nearly one-third of our national wealth.

The banking and business interests of the United States have had plenty of time to adopt measures to halt the depression if it was in their power. Up to date they have completely failed. Will any Member of Congress in this or the other body be willing to give them further opportunity to try out a system which they have already shown can not be worked? It is not only our right but it is our duty in this emergency to use the full power of Government to relieve the suffering scores of millions of our citizens and to formulate plans to prevent a recurrence of such an economic disaster.

The principle of expansion of public works in times of depression has been recommended by so many economists, so many socially minded business men and labor leaders, that I need hardly add anything to what has already been said.

Over a year ago more than a hundred of our leading economists, through a statement released to the press in January, 1931, favored this form of relief. In the last paragraph of their formal statement they declared that "the cost of public works could not be compared to the loss sustained by all classes of the Nation if such expenditures were not made."

I leave it to Senators to say whether or not this prediction has been fulfilled.

The Engineering News-Record, in a series of editorials a few months ago, urged the expenditure of billions by the Nation, stating that—

> Public construction constituted a reservoir of employment greater than any draft that could be made upon it.

In an editorial entitled "Work for All," published last September, the statement was made:

> We are not forced to depend on charity, then. We can work our way out. And the means are available. We lack neither money nor the ability to organize and plan quickly.

In November, 1931, this same journal said, editorially:

> To-day, even more than three months ago, when we warned of the winter's emergency and called for a large nationally supported program of public-works construction, public works offer the only possibility for giving work to the unemployed.

I have no sympathy with the cry uttered by the President that we can not afford to embark on a program of public works, which would give employment to the unemployed men and women of the country, restore purchasing power, and add to the Nation's wealth. It is my firm conviction that if we do not decide to spend five billions, or more, in order to put millions of men and women to work as promptly as it can be done, it will cost us many times this amount in the further depreciation of all forms of property values.

I earnestly hope that the Congress will appreciate, before it is too late, not only the suffering of the poverty-stricken people of the Nation but also the danger of the further depletion that all our citizens face in permitting the conditions of the last two years to continue.

It is evident that those who talk about increasing the channels of credit are taking a secondary factor for the primary one. There can not in the long run be any more available credit until there is more purchasing power in the hands of the masses of our people. Business must be convinced that if it avails itself of that credit it will find purchasers for its goods. Since the depression started we have been approaching this problem from the wrong end—that is, pouring the money in at the top instead of reestablishing purchasing power at the bottom.

A public-works program inaugurated by the Federal Government at this time and continued with the energy and boldness of war times would check the depression and start us on the upward course. Nothing else will do it, and the time is short in which to make the effort.

I agree with President Hoover in one respect, when he says that the back of the depression can not be broken by any single Government undertaking. That is undoubtedly true. It may require a great number of Government undertakings even to halt the general trend of business.

Obviously we not only have to provide work for those who are unemployed, but we have to provide direct relief for those whom we can not employ and whom our State, municipal, and private charity organizations have been unable to reach. That is the first step.

The second step is some Government undertaking to provide public works. I have long felt that some concrete measure should be introduced which can take effect in the immediate future. I have studied with the utmost interest the thoroughly thought-out programs suggested by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], and other Members of this body. I think in the long run some plan such as that proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will have to be adopted. I merely wish at the present time to introduce a bill which it seems to me might get immediate results, which will take effect a little more speedily than any of the other measures which are at present before Congress.

I have been stirred, perhaps, into somewhat earlier action than would otherwise have been the case by the statement of the President of the United States. I have not seen the program to be offered by our friends across the aisle. It seems to me, however, from what I have read of it in the newspapers, that it can not be adequate to relieve the situation which exists. For that reason, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to introduce the bill which I have referred to and to have it printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 4737) to provide a fund for Federal public works in times of business depression to stabilize business and to provide work for the unemployed was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 4737

A bill to provide a fund for Federal public works in times of business depression to stabilize business and to provide work for the unemployed

Whereas the industrial history of the last half century in the United States shows that no decade has been without its acute business depression accompanied by long periods of unemployment for millions of workers; that coincident with this vast waste of labor power is the similar waste of idle factories, machinery, and capital; and that these constantly recurring periods of business depression bring not only anxiety, hunger, and misery to those who are thrown out of work but break down the industrial machine itself and cause the permanent deterioration of the worker in body and mind, increased sickness, and demands upon our hospitals and charitable institutions, and finally crime waves and other forms of disorder which menace the peace and security of society; and

Whereas in the expansion of public works, at all times, lies a natural remedy not only for unemployment but for the stabilization of business; and

Whereas the Nation is again in the midst of a serious business depression—the third within the last 15 years; and

Whereas there is to-day great need, throughout the country, of public works such as post roads, afforestation, canal and river transport, flood-control projects, elimination of grade crossings, public buildings, and river and harbor improvements: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is authorized to borrow, from time to time, on the credit of the United States, to meet expenditures authorized by this act, an amount not exceeding in the aggregate $5,000,000,000, and to issue therefor bonds of the United States.

SEC. 2. A sum of money not exceeding $2,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay all necessary expenses, including rent, incident to the issuance and disposal of said bonds.

SEC. 3. The bonds herein authorized shall be in such form or forms and subject to such terms and conditions of issue, conversion, redemption, maturities, payment, and rate or rates of interest as the Secretary of the Treasury, from time to time, at or before the issue thereof, may prescribe.

SEC. 4. Such bonds shall be exempt from all taxes or duties of the United States.

SEC. 5. None of the bonds authorized under this act shall bear the circulation privilege.

SEC. 6. (a) The bonds herein authorized shall from time to time first be offered at not less than par as a popular loan, under such regulations, prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time, as will in his opinion give the people of the United States as nearly as may be an equal opportunity to participate therein, but he may make allotment in full upon applications for smaller amounts of bonds in advance of any date which he may set for the closing of subscriptions and may reject or reduce allotments upon later applications from incorporated banks and trust companies for their own account and make allotment in full or larger allotments to others, and may establish a graduated scale of allotments, and may from time to time adopt any or all of said methods, should any such action be deemed by him to be in the public interest.

(b) Such reduction or increase of allotments of such bonds shall be made under general rules to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and shall apply to all subscribers similarly situated.

(c) Any portion of the bonds so offered and not taken may be otherwise disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury in such manner and at such price or prices, not less than par, as he may determine.

SEC. 7. There is created in the Treasury a cumulative sinking fund for the retirement of bonds issued under this act. The sinking fund is hereby appropriated for the payment of such bonds at maturity, or for the redemption and purchase before maturity by the Secretary of the Treasury at such prices and upon such terms and conditions as he shall prescribe, and shall be available until all such bonds are retired. The average cost of the bonds purchased shall not exceed par and accrued interest. Bonds purchased, redeemed, or paid out of the sinking fund shall be canceled and retired and shall not be reissued. For each fiscal year, until all such bonds are retired, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, for the purpose of such sinking fund, an amount equal to the sum of 2 per cent of the aggregate amount of such bonds estimated to be outstanding at the end of the preceding fiscal year.

SEC. 8. The proceeds of said bonds shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and be kept in a separate fund which shall be known as the unemployment relief fund and which shall be used only for the purposes of this act.

SEC. 9. The President, from time to time, shall approve the offering of such bonds for sale in such amounts as may be necessary, in his judgment, to provide sufficient money to pay for the work provided for herein, and the expenses incidental thereto or for any other expenditures authorized by this act.

SEC. 10. The President shall append each year to the Budget submitted to Congress:

(1) A statement of the amount of money realized during the preceding fiscal year from the sale of bonds authorized by this act, and the condition of the unemployment relief fund at the beginning and the end of the fiscal year;

(2) A statement of expenditures under this act in the preceding fiscal year;

(3) A statement of the work done under this act during the previous fiscal year and of the work authorized for the current fiscal year; and

(4) A statement of the amount realized from sales of bonds prior to October 1 of the current year.

SEC. 11. The aforesaid sum of $5,000,000,000, or so much thereof as may be derived from time to time from the issue and disposal of said bonds, is appropriated for the purposes of this act and shall be allocated by the Secretary of the Treasury on the direction of the President, among the different departments and independent establishments of the Government, hereinafter provided for, in such manner and in such proportion as may seem to the President best for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 12. Within one month after the passage of this act a report shall be made to the President:

(a) By the Secretary of Agriculture of projects for the completion and improvement of highways approved by him under the Federal highways act;

(b) By the Secretary of the Treasury of projects—

(1) In respect of public buildings under his jurisdiction already under construction and the construction of which may be hastened to the advantage of the Government by the expenditure of funds authorized to be expended under this act;

(2) In respect of public buildings under his jurisdiction which have been authorized by Congress and approved by the Secretary;

(3) In respect of buildings under other departments and independent establishments of the Government, plans and specifications for which have been prepared in the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury. In his report the Secretary of the Treasury shall state those projects upon which contracts may be entered into immediately and those projects upon which further preparation is required before they can be advertised for bids;

(c) By the Secretary of War projects under his direction in respect of flood control or river and harbor improvement which have been provided for by Congress and approved by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors or by any other boards—

(1) Which have been begun but completion of which may be hastened by the expenditure of money appropriated by this act;

(2) Which have not yet begun but which are ready for submission for bidding; and

(3) Which are not yet ready for submission for bidding.

SEC. 13. (a) The President from time to time shall designate the project or projects to be undertaken under the authority of this act and shall specify the sum to be set aside from the unemployment relief fund to carry out each project so designated. He may at any time increase or decrease any sum so specified in respect of any project.

(b) In making such designation the President shall take into consideration the relief of unemployment, the stabilization of business, and the urgency of the project;

(c) Any sum so specified for public buildings or flood control or river and harbor improvement shall be assigned to the department or independent establishment which has reported the project to the President and shall be treated as are appropriations by Congress to such departments or independent establishments for similar construction, except there shall be no monthly allocation of such sum.

SEC. 14. (a) The President is authorized to apply any part of the unemployment relief fund to work upon any project or projects reported to him by the Secretary of Agriculture and to allot such funds to the Secretary of Agriculture, and such project or projects shall be carried on under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture.

(b) In addition to such projects and for the further relief of unemployment and stabilization of business the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to construct a nation-wide system of hard-surfaced post roads connecting the capitals or principal cities of the several States and the District of Columbia on such routes as he may approve and report to the President. The President may approve any or all routes so reported and may allot any portion of the unemployment relief fund to the construction of all or any part of the route so reported.

(c) Any sums so allocated to the Secretary of Agriculture shall be treated as nearly as possible as is money appropriated by Congress for the construction of public buildings, except that there shall be no monthly allocation thereof.

(d) A total of not less than $3,000,000,000 of the money available under this act shall be applied on work done under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture under this act.

SEC. 15. The Secretary of Agriculture shall have all the powers necessary to carry out his duties under this act and shall cooperate with the authorities in each State charged with the duty of highway construction.

SEC. 16. In laying out the highway routes, under this act, the Secretary of Agriculture shall take into consideration existing highways and may with the consent of the proper authorities in each State apply any part of the money allotted to him by the President in widening or improving highways.

SEC. 17. This act is not intended to repeal or interfere with any provision of the Federal highways act, unless such provision is in direct conflict herewith.

SEC. 18. Each Secretary to whom allotments are made under this act shall have power to acquire real estate or any interest therein for the purposes of this act, in the same way as is provided by law for the acquisition of similar property for similar purposes: Provided, That the acquisition of real estate or any interest therein by the Secretary of Agriculture shall be made in the same way and under the same provisions of law which provide for the acquisition of similar property for river and harbor works. Property so acquired may be paid for from such allotments.

SEC. 19. The post roads provided for under this act, except as otherwise provided by the Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the President, shall be durable and hard-surfaced and—

(a) Of a width not less than 20 feet, except in rough, mountainous, or sparsely settled regions, or other extreme cases;

(b) Wherever practicable, for at least 5 miles out from the corporate limits of any city of over 200,000 population, said hard-surfaced roadway, parts of said post road, shall have at least four traffic lanes of approximately 10 feet in width, or such greater number of such traffic lanes as will, in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture, meet all reasonable traffic requirements and insure safety and economy in traveling; and

(c) Wherever practicable, for at least 10 miles out from the corporate limits of any city of over 800,000 population, there shall be at least six such traffic lanes.

SEC. 20. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, with the allotment from the unemployment relief fund made by the President, to have made any surveys, plans, specifications, estimates, and other preparations necessary for the construction of the post roads provided for herein.

SEC. 21. Works to be carried on under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury or of the Secretary of War shall be carried on as is provided by law for similar works under authorization of Congress

SEC. 22. The provisions of law relating to the carrying on of work for river and harbor improvements shall apply as far as possible to the construction, completion, or improvement of post roads under this act, except that the Secretary of Agriculture shall be substituted for the Secretary of War.

SEC. 23. (a) There shall be a temporary supervising engineer of post roads in the Department of Agriculture, who shall be appointed by the President for a term of three years by and with the consent of the Senate. He shall supervise the plans and construction of the post roads authorized herein and perform such other duties as the Secretary of Agriculture shall require. His salary shall be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture with the approval of the President.

(b) The appropriate Secretary may contract for the services of such engineers, experts, and other technical and office assistants as he may deem necessary for the purposes of carrying out his duties under this act.

(c) The compensation of the temporary supervising engineer, and of other persons under contract as provided in this section, shall be paid from allotments made from the unemployment relief fund.

(d) So far as possible, technical and office assistants shall be appointed from the list of persons qualified for such positions under the civil service act.

SEC. 24. If any provision of this act should be held to be invalid, such invalid provisions shall not affect the validity of any other provisions of this act which can be given effect.

SEC. 25. This act shall take effect on its passage.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only a few minutes in order to call attention to an amendment which I have offered as a separate paragraph to follow the pending committee amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HULL. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to inquire of the Senator if I understand correctly what he has said. Does the Senator offer this amendment as an amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. HULL. No; I offer it as a separate paragraph to follow that amendment.

The amendment proposes that the United States Government shall agree not to increase its protective tariffs above the present level for two years nor interpose obstructions to trade, provided other governments agree to pursue a like policy.

The bill that was vetoed by the President some days ago contained a provision authorizing and requesting the Executive to convene an international economic conference, a part of the purpose of which should be to bring about, as nearly as might be possible, some degree of concerted action on the part of this and other nations for the purpose of readjusting downward excessive tariffs wherever they might exist. That measure having been vetoed, since the nations of the world, including our own, are unable to take any steps that might tend at least to check this constant movement upward of every kind of trade obstruction, every kind of exchange restriction, and every kind of barrier to the transfer of goods and capital and services across international boundaries, it is in my judgment very important, in the light of the present chaotic economic conditions here and everywhere, that this and other nations should pause in the wild excesses to which I have referred and take two years for the purpose of reexamination, for the purpose of stock taking, so to speak, in order that they might with more deliberation and with better judgment determine whether it is not eminently wise from the standpoint of the enlightened self-interest of every country alike that they should proceed somewhat in concert but, of course, acting separately and independently through their own respective parliamentary bodies to make readjustments downward in a manner that would gradually bring about a simplification and bring down to a moderate level this great tangled mass of obstructions and reprisals and impediments and retaliations, a complete network of which has been built up in the capital of every civilized nation.

Mr. President, I repeat that the purpose of this amendment is to say, in behalf of the American people, to the people of all other countries that if the nations can not make any reductions of excessive taxation and unnecessary impediments to trade, they should at least refrain from making increases upon the already wildly extravagant level that has been built up everywhere during the past 10 or 12 years.

It is sometimes suggested, and I desire to emphasize that fact, that during recent years and at this time not only are all phases of our industrial, commercial, and general economic affairs in a chaotic state but there are wide fluctuations in our currencies and in our exchange situations and in our prices, so that no government can with intelligence or with accuracy effect any important tariff readjustments at this time or at any early time in the future; and this condition of constant and material changes in commodity prices and in the exchange and currency situation, as I have stated, makes purely speculative any extended tariff readjustment, especially upward.

As I have said heretofore, I have entire respect for those who may differ from my individual view; but I should not consider myself faithful to the opinions I entertain, or to the fundamental economic philosophy of the political party to which I belong, if I did not undertake in a small way to assert my judgment as to the soundness of the ideas to which I am making reference.

It is easy for any of our friends to persuade themselves that the two political parties have merged, in effect, on tariffs, which in practical effect includes all economics; that they have merged, not on the principle alone but on the excesses that characterize our present-day tariff policy. I desire to offer the prediction that if the Democratic leadership in the different States of this Nation, and I am not referring to any Senate leaders, understakes to merge the two old parties to all intents and purposes, both as to economic philosophy and as to the notorious excesses that are being practiced, it will be no time until a new party, made up of as able and as patriotic citizenship as the American Nation or any other nation can afford, will rise up to champion the fundamentals of that wonderful economic philosophy which has been the glory of the Democratic Party and of the American Nation for more than a hundred years.

We need not deceive ourselves about the notion that we can merge the two political parties here on economics and on finances and on special interests of all kinds, and indulge in those wild excesses which are written on every page of the Smoot-Hawley Act, and expect the great American citizenship to undergo patiently and uncomplainingly and with perfect acquiescence all the penalties and injustices that this one-sided, inequitable system inevitably imposes upon the masses of this country.

Why, Mr. President, do we imagine for a moment that this city would be flooded with lobbyists at great expense, that these galleries would be crowded at all hours of the day and night with the highest-paid lobbyists in America, for days and weeks and months hovering over us here, as part of a great altruistic movement in the interest of the American public? Why, if we should start to enact here to-night a tariff bill that deprived them of the opportunity to collect special favors from the American public, they would strangle that bill in its infancy; and yet we are proceeding complacently upon the theory that those gentlemen are here in the public interest; that all these vast expenditures are to help guide the Congress along a wise and a sound course solely in the interest of the American public!

Mr. President, the merest tyro in economics knows that there must be two classes in any country that are parties to levies of protective tariffs, especially where they are levied unnecessarily high. The beneficiary always writes them high, and under our present-day policy he is permitted to write them. We know, however, that there must be one group of citizens to pay—they always pay—and there is another group to receive. If the citizenship of this country should be equalized with respect to tariff benefits, they would be shunned as a pestilence by everybody alike, and all of our lobbying friends would be left without an occupation.

But there must be a small group to receive, because it takes a larger group to pay, to bear the burden. The smaller group can receive without attracting so much attention.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HULL. In just a moment. I am trying to state the case, and then I shall be glad to yield. I have always welcomed a contribution from the able Senator from California.

I am just trying to say that every person recognizes that we do not go to a general sales tax or to a tariff act if we are looking for equity. We do not go to a tariff act if we are looking for economic equality. We do not go to it if we are looking for revenue, in case we permit the beneficiaries to fix the rates, because they fix them too high for revenue purposes. In other words, we may not be mindful of the fact that in the abstract a tariff is not equitable, but is for the benefit of certain individuals and certain groups of a limited nature.

That being the situation, we have seen one political party in this Nation always opposing the course and the policy of the chief tariff beneficiaries. We have never seen both political parties join in and undertake to monopolize the support of the chief tariff beneficiaries or to monopolize the economic philosophy which they maintain. That is only another reason why this country is not going to stand for two political parties supporting and championing prohibitive or embargo tariffs for long.

Here is an illustration of the significance of tariff by a great assemblage of people in 1876. They said:

> We denounce the present tariff levied upon nearly 4,000 articles as a masterpiece of injustice, inequality, and false pretense. It yields a dwindling, not a yearly rising revenue. It has impoverished many industries to subsidize a few. It prohibits imports that might purchase the products of American labor. It has degraded American commerce from the first to an inferior rank on the high seas. It has cut down the sales of American manufactures at home and abroad, and depleted the returns of American agriculture—an industry followed by half our people. It costs the people five times more than it produces to the Treasury, obstructs the processes of production, and wastes the fruits of labor.

That is just a sample. I would not have referred to the abstract nature of tariffs except for the fact that a friend of mine in the corridor this morning was very insistent to me that the two political parties here in Congress had virtually merged on not only the same economic philosophy, of which our present ultrahigh tariff policy is the head and front, but upon all those minor phases of economics which go along with it, including Power Trust interests, activities, and influences, and other minor phases of special privilege which are a supporting part of the prohibitive and embargo tariff structure which to so large extent exists to-day.

I resent very strongly the suggestion that the Democratic Party has now merged, in effect, with the dominant influences in the Republican Party with respect to the ultrahigh tariff policies that are in vogue here and in many other countries at this time.

I do wish to emphasize, however, that unless this and other Nations halt and examine this almost impossible state of production and trade and finance the time is near at hand, in my judgment, when there may be another collapse of our whole economic structure in all the important countries.

We already have a virtual collapse of both international trade and domestic trade. We already have a complete collapse of international credit and international finance, and the exchange situation is all broken down. There is no possible way in which we can sell our surpluses anywhere except in a very trivial way.

Upon these considerations I base the suggestion carried in the pending amendment that this country could do no wiser thing than by adopting the amendment and thereby taking a lead in quietly suggesting to the other nations that the time has come when, if we can not reduce tariffs, we should at least agree not to increase them beyond the already mad and wild heights to which they have been lifted.

Two years would afford a breathing spell. Two years would give time to reexamine and to analyze both our domestic and our international problems. We could then ascertain with some degree of deliberation just to what extent permanent and sound business recovery requires not only our efforts here at home but to what extent some degree of sane, practical international cooperation can be effective in restoring the low level of commodity prices in the world market and in restoring the credit and the exchange situation, which to-day bears so heavily and so oppressively upon the domestic economic situation of every important nation.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I have listened with much interest to the Senator who has just yielded the floor, and if he will pardon me, I will put to him now a question or two which I had hoped to have the honor of putting to him a few moments ago.

I understand the Senator to have said that he takes a firm position as against the so-called extortionate rates of duty fixed in the present tariff law, the so-called Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act. I was prompted to put a question to the Senator in respect of certain of those rates, not to provoke argument, or to cause any embarrassment.

Mr. HULL. The Senator will not embarrass me, I assure him.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I would not do so intentionally. I will incorporate half a dozen or more items in one question.

The poultry association of practically every State of the Union and the National Poultry Association appeared before the respective proper committees and petitioned and urged and argued for a certain rate on certain poultry products imported from foreign countries. The State and the national dairy associations likewise appeared, petitioned, and argued, appealed, indeed, for certain rates on certain dairy products imported.

The almond associations from States raising almonds, the walnut associations from States raising walnuts, the lemon and orange associations from States raising lemons and oranges, the fig associations, and the cotton associations petitioned and argued with force, certainly with great earnestness, in favor of certain rates, and as to none of these several products mentioned does the present tariff law accord the rates which were sought by those several associations.

I mention particularly the fig association. I recall vividly the argument made by an intelligent citizen of Texas, presented before the Finance Committee by the distinguished junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], and I recall him because of his masterly, and, I thought, convincing argument in favor of certain rates of tariff duty on figs—for it is well known that Texas, as California, is a great fig-producing State.

I repeat that I did not intend to invite argument. I wished merely to ask the Senator whether, when denouncing or inveighing against the tariff act now the law, he is opposed to any of the rates on any of the products mentioned. That is my immediate question.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, in order to make the best possible impression on the distinguished Senator from California, for the purpose of answering his question, I will just adopt the economic philosophy of James A. Garfield as applicable to the Senator's proposition, and read that to him:

> Duty should be so high that manufacturers can fairly compete with the foreign product, but not so high as to enable them to drive out the foreign article, enjoy a monopoly of the trade, and regulate the price as they please.

Under this so-called yardstick of the difference between the costs of production here and abroad, not one penny's worth of one article remotely competitive would get into this country, even by accident. The Senator's tariff bill is far above this pronouncement of Senator Garfield, I believe, when he was a Member of the House. Not only that, but I recall that all of our peanut friends were given a tariff of 186 per cent, and the guaranty that they would all make good profits. They are all broke now, I think, and that 186 per cent tariff is still suspended over their heads as a sort of economic insult to them, on account of its unreasonableness, its extravagance, and its lack of any sort of moderation.

Our egg friends came along and got what they wanted. They had been told by propagandists that the higher they fixed a tariff the more they would get for their eggs.

One of my associates, operating a farm, informed me that he only gets about 7 cents at the farm for his eggs. Our friends were assured when they placed the rate up above 8 cents a pound where it originally was, and under which rate we did not average more than 5 cents of tariff benefit; yet it was jumped from 8 to 12 and then to 14 cents, with the constant copper-riveted assurance to the dairyman that his prices would go up accordingly, and yet to-day his prices are lower than they have been in 20 or 25 years. They are down to 20 cents a pound.

I want to inquire of the distinguished Senator from California why he is not undertaking to apologize for all this vast list of promises that have been made to the produce men, the dairy men, and the farm commodity prices generally instead of seeking to catechize and criticize me? Perhaps the Senator is merely undertaking to divert attention from the awful situation.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Far from it.

Mr. HULL. That is the practice of the champions of the ultrahigh tariff, not only here but everywhere. The strange thing about it, if the Senator will permit me to interject, is that all the nations never had such mountain-high embargo tariffs as they have had during the last few years under our leadership.

All of them have been subjected to the most devastating, destructive panics that ever befell the human race during the age of civilization and yet the Senator, with all his tariff beneficiaries broke and flat on their backs and millions of them out of employment and millions of them driven into bankruptcy, has the hardihood—I shall not say effrontery, because the Senator is never guilty of effrontery—but he has the hardihood to solemnly brush aside this unthinkable condition of distress and panic and divert attention by catechizing some wholly innocent person like myself.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I rose to say that I did not intend to engage in controversy with the Senator over the philosophies entertained by the different Members of this body, but to propound a question.

Mr. HULL. If the Senator will permit me, I want to say that if we are not interested in settling the true and sound economic philosophy that ought to apply in this country, then we are not specially interested in the entire subject matter of the tariff.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator inveighed against the existing law, denounced it in proper parliamentary language, and I rose to ask him whether he objected to certain rates. It is so easy to indulge in glittering generalities or, as a Democratic philosopher once said, "general glitteralities"—very easy, indeed. We placed certain rates on poultry products, on dairy products—casein, for example—on lemons, on oranges, on cotton, on figs, on walnuts, on almonds, and on many other items that fall within the category of horticulture or agriculture.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Pardon me for a moment. I do not care to enter into a discussion of the philosophies of the so-called free-trade theory or the so-called protective-tariff theory. I am more or less familiar with those theories and with the record of the past in our country and in all other countries. What I have asked other Senators and what I have put out in public is in essence this:

Instead of discussing philosophies, are they objecting to any specific rate, whether it be called a relatively protective rate or whether it be denounced as an excessively high protective rate? Do they object to any particular rate? I undertake to say that there are not two more thoughtful Senators, Members of this body, than the two Senators from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. TRAMMELL]. These two learned Senators, the learned senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], the former learned Senator from Louisiana, Mr. Ransdell, and the learned Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]—all Democrats—voted for the present so-called Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act.

But my friend from Tennessee may say that is neither here nor there. But with great respect, and not to embarrass or to get into personal controversy, I repeat, as I have many times inquired of Senators, to what particular items in the bill do they object? If the Senator from Tennessee cares to answer, he may do so; if he does not care to answer, be it so.

Mr. HULL. I will say to the Senator—I would assume he is familiar with it, because it was published in the papers—that during the last week I offered an amendment to the pending bill which proposes to go up to the prohibitive embargo range of rates in the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill and reduce by 20 per cent in all cases where a rate is above 40 per cent, but reducing no rate below 40 per cent. I hope that will please the Senator, if it does not satisfy him.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I beg the Senator's pardon, but let me look him right in the eye now and say that I do not think he is willing to admit that he is opposed to any one of the rates fixed to which I have referred. Does he want to reduce the rate on cotton, on figs, on oranges, on poultry products, on dairy products, or not?

Mr. HULL. I expressly and avowedly subscribe to the amendment which I have pending which proposes to reduce not alone those rates at the top but every rate bearing an import duty in the Smoot-Hawley Act over 40 per cent ad valorem—to reduce them by 20 per cent.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Including the ones I have mentioned?

Mr. HULL. Yes; every one of them. That is just a preliminary step, operating on the top range, where the intervention of a tariff fact-finding commission is not necessary.

I will say further to the Senator that I have in great elaboration set out just how I would undertake to deal, if I had my way, with the present business situations, the economic situation, and the tariff and commercial questions which relate to them. I would proceed carefully and gradually to a readjustment downward with a level of moderation as my objective. I would do that with the aid of a fact-finding commission. I would pursue the policy that as the country becomes economically independent, it should in this or that instance throw off artificial restraints and restrictions.

Then I would be careful to recognize at every step the hot house industries that have existed in this country as we have built up industry generally. From my viewpoint, while there would be some utterly inefficient concerns which it would be necessary to improve in their efficiency, I think we would have not only an increasing domestic trade with all the manufacturing concerns on a healthier and sounder basis but we would have what we have not to-day—to wit, a great and growing foreign market for every ounce of our surplus agricultural, mineral, and manufactured products.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. To end this controversy and yield the floor, I ask the Senator if he thinks the oil men of America can compete with foreign producers; if the people of California engaged in the poultry industry can compete with China; if those in Wisconsin or Michigan, for example, engaged in dairying can compete with all other countries; if the cotton people, in respect to the long-staple variety, can compete with the long-staple cotton producers of Egypt? In other words, I take it the Senator is a free trader, a low-tariff advocate, and hence is opposed to the existing law and thinks that there should be a general reduction of all the rates fixed in the present law, and proposes also that we should enter into negotiations with foreign countries, all to the end that there might be a free exchange of commodities among or between the nations of the world.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator makes reference to the low cost of production of foreign oil. He assumes a fact which does not exist.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. There is a differential of at least $1.03 per barrel between Venezuelan oil and Louisiana or California oil. I know it.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will bear with me, I will show that his premise is erroneous.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Proceed; but the Senator can not show it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I hold in my hand the pay roll of the Pan American Oil Co. for six months in Venezuela. Often we hear upon the floor of the Senate the assertion that this oil is produced by peon or slave labor. Let us see how much the labor gets.

A driller gets $350 a month. He gets a subsistence allowance of $123 a month in addition, making a total of $502 a month.

A tool pusher gets $450 a month in Venezuela and a subsistence allowance of $123. He also gets a vacation allowance of $37, making a total monthly allowance of $610.

A machinist gets $250 a month, a subsistence allowance of $123, and $21 a month vacation allowance, or a total monthly allowance of $394.

A boilermaker receives $225 a month——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. This is all in the RECORD.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; it has not been put in the RECORD. The point I want to make with the Senator is that these wages, with the subsistence allowance, are higher than are paid in any oil field in America.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The question is, What does it cost to produce or bring forth a barrel of crude oil or petroleum in Venezuela and what does it cost to bring forth a barrel of crude oil in Louisiana or in Oklahoma or in Texas or in California? According to the detailed examination and conclusions of the Tariff Commission, the difference or the differential is at least $1.03.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am not dealing with individual wages.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. For a question or two only.

Mr. TYDINGS. The $1.03, as the Senator knows, applies only to certain grades of oil. There are oils of various degrees of viscosity, and the Senator knows that is not a constant figure. I have only to refer to the speech made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] the other day, who stated that he had gone into this matter very carefully and explained in great detail that the dollar increase as a differential did not apply.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I take it from the Senator's remarks, then, that he does not favor any tariff on crude petroleum?

Mr. TYDINGS. No; and for this reason——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator believes——

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator let me answer his question?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Allow me to put the question in the affirmative form.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well, I will wait until the Senator finishes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator believes in admitting crude petroleum, oil, from any or all countries free of any duty? Is that a fair way to put the question?

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator now give me an opportunity to answer the question?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Let the Senator answer yes or no.

Mr. TYDINGS. First of all, let us see how much good it will do.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am not asking that question.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am going to give the Senator an answer, but I do not want to answer him in his words.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; I want the Senator to answer yes or no.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am going to answer the Senator categorically, but I am going to tell him the reason for the answer first, because I do not want to be cut off and have a false impression created.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator has taken many hours during the last week in explaining his theories in respect of oil and other imports; and I have enjoyed listening to him and been enlightened, but not persuaded or convinced. I now merely wish to ask him a question and not invite a repetition of arguments heretofore made.

Mr. TYDINGS. I will be glad to answer the Senator's question if he will give me the chance.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Well, I will withdraw the question, then.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am sorry the Senator has withdrawn it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I want to ask the Senator a question, if he will give just about one minute to me. As a matter of fact, he might include the taxes that are paid on American oil; that alone would take up more than the tariff—merely the item of taxes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Exactly.

Mr. LONG. I do not suppose the simple item of royalties would take up more than the difference. The table the Senator has read we have seen many times before, have we not?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. We have, indeed.

Mr. LONG. Practically every time the subject has been under discussion.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to read the Senator a few short paragraphs.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. From what document?

Mr. TYDINGS. Of statistics.

The Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, according to the Journal of Commerce of February 16, 1931, last year sold something over 3,000,000,000 gallons of gasoline in addition to its other products. Its imports were approximately 10,000,000 barrels.

It sold 3,000,000,000 gallons and only imported 10,000,000 barrels.

Could anything be more ridiculous than the argument based upon such premises, that 2½ cents per gallon tax on gasoline will reach a gross intake of at least $67,500,000 a year to New Jersey on this little 3,000,000,000 basis?

That, of course, refers only to the American market.

It is also pointed out that the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey wants oil kept on the free list. I am pointing out to the Senator that an infinitesimal part of all the oil sold by that company was imported.

Another one of the companies is the Dutch Shell. The Senator knows that the Dutch Shell Co. has the third largest holding of American producing oil fields of any company in the country. In other words, one of these companies whose imports are to be excluded has already bought the third largest local production in America. So it will not make a bit of difference whether the oil is excluded or not, because the bulk of their supply is now coming from the home field.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I see that certain inferences are to be drawn or conclusions reached from the facts to which the Senator refers, but I go back to the primal question.

Mr. TYDINGS. Now, I will give the Senator his answer.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator favors—and it is not to engage in any discussion of the matter that I put the question to him—the Senator therefore, favors the admission of oils, for brevity, without the payment of any duty?

Mr. TYDINGS. I do and for the reasons stated.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Exactly, Mr. President, I am ready for a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] if his amendment would bring about any increase in the protective tariff of the United States if one particular nation entered into an agreement with the United States not to increase its tariff?

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think it is evident that people of all degrees and shades of tariff persuasion in this country and in most other countries upon a careful, calm review and examination of the present hopelessly obstructed condition of trade and finance and commerce, especially in all international channels, will agree that some degree of concerted action on the part of all the principal countries is very important and really very necessary in justice to each. The parliamentary government of each nation would, of course, proceed in its own way in readjusting tariffs downward and in liberalizing commercial policy, but the proposal submitted by me makes the appeal to all alike.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The amendment does not propose committing the United States Government to enter into an agreement with any one country not to raise rates, and then, after a period of two years to enter into agreements with a substantial number of the other nations that they will not raise any of their tariffs?

Mr. HULL. The amendment is really an invitation on the part of this country to others to take a two years' vacation from this wild movement upward in tariff rates. Outside of that the amendment will amount to nothing unless and until the other countries subscribe to the same proposal.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It would not permit an agreement being made by the United States with any one country?

Mr. HULL. No.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The question is, is it not, on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] to the amendment of the committee?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that the Senator from Tennessee did not offer the amendment, but simply stated he would offer it.

Mr. HULL. It is offered as a separate paragraph immediately following the committee amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment. I move to insert, in line 7, page 244, following the word "sides," the words "excepting flooring."

If this language were incorporated in the amendment, it would make clear that a duty of $3 per thousand feet board measure should not apply to flooring.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to call for a quorum?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No.

Mr. DILL. Those who are the proponents of the amendment are not here, and I think they ought to be here.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Senators are tired of acting like bell hops answering quorum calls, and I am not going to be a party to bringing them here at this time.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me for a moment, this question was up earlier in the day and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] said he had no objection to this amendment being incorporated in the pending amendment. My colleague the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is not on the floor, and I had hoped he might be here, because he is better prepared to decide whether or not this amendment should be accepted than is perhaps anyone else.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I suggest that in the brief time I am taking the junior Senator from Washington may send for the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. President, I am going to be very brief. I think Senators are tired responding to quorum calls every 10 or 15 minutes. I think we ought to do some business here without requiring Senators constantly to answer to such calls. We hardly get through one quorum call and Senators come in than there is another.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is right, because when a quorum is called Senators come in and expect to vote, but, instead of voting, they find that some other Senator gets the floor and begins a speech, and they all leave and justly and properly so. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will not, of course, ask for action until the Senators referred to are present, but they are familiar with the point I am making. When I had the floor this morning I said that I thought flooring was included within the term "lumber," and I used the definition of the American lumber standards that has been adopted by a unanimous action in four general lumber conferences. The definition which they give is as follows:

> Lumber is the product of the saw and planing mill not further manufactured than by sawing, resawing, and passing lengthwise through a standard planing machine, crosscut to length and matched.

Under this definition all "lumber" is then classified into three major divisions: (a) Yard lumber, (b) structural timbers, and (c) factory or shop lumber.

A large number of forms of lumber are enumerated which it is claimed come within the definition of lumber. Among these materials of wood are finish, casing and base, flooring, ceiling, siding, partition, silo stock, ladder stock, piano posts, cross arms, and other wood cut in the sawmill and planed or not planed for specified uses. Boards, dimension, joists and plank, small sawed timbers, large sawed timbers, sawed cross and switch ties, small dimension stock—that is, stock ready cut to specified, usually small, dimensions, lath, shingles (possibly), and veneer (possibly).

The trade considers flooring as lumber; I do not think the proponents of this amendment desire flooring to be included; but I want to make sure it is excluded, and that is why I am proposing this amendment.

Mr. President, let me add that we can not read this law in connection with existing tariff law. The two are entirely separate. The so-called tariff items in this bill are exempt from the flexible-tariff provision. No one can petition, if we shall adopt this amendment, to have these duties raised or lowered.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I do not see any reason why, if we are going to have a lumber tariff, flooring ought to be excepted or treated different from any other kind of lumber. What reason does the Senator urge why it is proper to put tariff on weatherboards and ceiling and not on flooring?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is just the point. I want to have it clearly settled whether we are going to include flooring or not. I assume the proponents of the original amendment will agree that flooring should be excluded. It already has a tax of 8 per cent, and if it is included in this provision a further tax will be put on flooring, for it will have a tax of 8 per cent plus $3 per thousand. Does the Senator understand that?

Mr. LONG. I did not know that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; unless this amendment shall be adopted, flooring such as is used in the ordinary house, which sells for about $40 a thousand, will have a tax of 8 per cent on a thousand feet. On that flooring there is already a tax of $3.20; and if flooring shall be embraced in the word "lumber," the adoption of the pending amendment without amendment would mean a tax of $6.20.

Mr. LONG. I see a valid reason why the amendment should be accepted. I did not know the circumstances, and I thank the Senator.

Mr. JONES entered the Chamber.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will say to the Senator from Washington that I have offered an amendment to the amendment proposing to incorporate in the amendment the words "except flooring." I think from the discussion we had a few minutes ago the Senator is rather inclined to be of the opinion that flooring was not intended to be embraced in the term "lumber." Therefore I assume the Senator accepts this amendment.

Mr. JONES. I do not understand that I had any conversation that would lead anybody to that conclusion. I think, certainly, flooring is lumber.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That proves just what I have been contending here. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] challenged my statement that it did include lumber. He said it does not include lumber. Let us have it determined, because that is a very important item, and it means 100 per cent increase in the tax on flooring if it is incorporated.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator contends that on flooring there is now a tax of 8 per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Eight per cent.

Mr. JONES. That is in another paragraph somewhere else?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly.

Mr. JONES. I do not think that is covered by this item.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am very glad to hear the Senator say so; but I raised the question that this law could not be associated or connected with the tariff law. It is entirely set apart, as a separate law. We have exempted the flexible tariff provisions from operating so far as these items are concerned.

Mr. JONES. I can not agree with the Senator in that respect. I think every tariff item is subject to the commission's power to act.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The language is right here. I have had an amendment on the subject drawn by the experts. The language is right here, providing that no items in this bill shall be subject to the flexible tariff provisions.

Mr. JONES. I did not know that item was in the bill. It certainly is not a part of my amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is the trouble. The people of the country do not know it, either. They will be very much astonished when they wake up and find that we have made a tariff bill here distinct and separate from the policy we have adopted now for 10 years; that we have set apart these items with a special tax, away from consideration and review by any board or by the President, and that Congress alone can act.

Mr. JONES. May I ask the Senator if that provision has been adopted as a part of this bill?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It has not been specifically acted on by the Senate, but it is in the House text.

Mr. JONES. I am not in favor of that provision myself.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator is not in favor of it?

Mr. JONES. No.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. JONES. I think these tariff items ought to be subject to the Tariff Commission just the same as if they were in any other law.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. JONES. But I do not want to assume that that provision will be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator agree to the amendment that I am now proposing, excepting flooring?

Mr. JONES. I do not think so. I do not know whether there is a technical definition of lumber or not. I suppose probably there is; but I want whatever may be covered by that technical word, however it is construed. I take it that flooring is lumber. I assume that it is lumber. I can not imagine what else it could be.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understood that if the Senator was informed that there was a separate tax of 8 per cent on flooring in the present law, he would exclude flooring from this particular tax.

Mr. JONES. Not expressly. I will leave that to the construction of the commission.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. I think there was a little confusion between the Senator from Massachusetts and myself this morning, due to the fact that apparently neither one of us kept in mind the fact that paragraph 402 of the act of 1930 is limited to certain kinds of flooring, namely, maple, birch, and beech. As I understand now, the Senator from Massachusetts attempts by his amendment to except all flooring, which would include the softwood floorings as well.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. All floorings; yes.

Mr. STEIWER. The argument for the exception which the Senator would seek to make would be sound within the theory upon which he is proceeding so far as the three hardwood floorings are concerned. The argument would not apply, however, to floorings of softwood.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator is willing that the words "except flooring" shall be incorporated if they apply only to hardwoods?

Mr. STEIWER. I would not want to take the responsibility of doing that. I can not speak for other Senators.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Has not the tariff of 8 per cent on flooring resulted in diminishing the importations of flooring, so that there is not any need of an increased tax?

Mr. STEIWER. I think there is a diminished importation. I am not so sure that it is the result of the tariff. Certainly, however, the Senator would not want to extend his amendment to the point of covering softwood flooring.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I would want to extend it to all that kind of flooring which in the present law bears a tax of 8 per cent. That seems to me fair. That is already covered.

Mr. STEIWER. Of course, from the standpoint of those who are advocates of this duty, that would be far less objectionable than the present form of the Senator's proposal.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Something has been said about these duties being exempt from the flexible provisions. Let me call the attention of Senators to page 240, which is in the House text and can be removed only by an amendment from the floor, which I expect to offer later. Paragraph (b), on page 239, reads as follows:

(b) The tax imposed under subsection (a) shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as a duty imposed by the tariff act of 1930, and shall be treated for the purposes of all provisions of law relating to the customs revenue as a duty imposed by such act, except that—

(1) The value on which such tax shall be based shall be the sum of (A) the dutiable value (under section 503 of such act) of the article, plus (B) the customs duties, if any, imposed thereon under any provision of law.

(2) For the purposes of section 489 of such act (relating to additional duties in certain cases of undervaluation) such tax shall not be considered an ad valorem rate of duty or a duty based upon or regulated in any manner by the value of the article, and for the purposes of section 336 of such act (the so-called flexible tariff provision) such tax shall not be considered a duty.

Clearly exempting them.

Now, Mr. President, I think we ought to have a vote. Let the Senators know just what we are voting on. The question is whether we shall proceed to put a tax upon rough lumber of $3 per thousand feet, a tax upon sawed lumber of $3 plus $1 already there, making a total of $4 per thousand, and also a tax upon flooring which bears a duty of 8 per cent ad valorem in the present law, and add to that a tax of $3 per thousand feet, which will represent an increase, I am informed, of 100 per cent in the tax on flooring that goes into the homes of all the people of this country. We now have a tax of 8 per cent, and this is 100 per cent increase.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Is the provision of the bill which provides that this character of tax shall not be held to be a duty in general terms, or is it merely for the purpose of being passed upon by the Tariff Commission under the flexible provision?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is a separate tariff bill that we are dealing with. This has no connection with the tariff law. It is eliminated from it; and we can not take up this law, when we come to interpret what lumber is, and read some section in another law.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The point I had in mind, about which I desired to ask the Senator, was this: If the provision in question differentiates this character of tax from a tariff tax, then would it not be a cumulative tax? Would not the tax provided in the tariff law apply as well as the tax provided here, so that we would have a cumulative tax—in other words, $1 a thousand on lumber under the tariff act and $3 a thousand under the provisions of this law?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Therefore we would have a duty of $4 a thousand.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It would be a cumulative tax, unless we specifically repeal the provisions of the tariff act applying to this particular item.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator is asserting what I have tried to say and have been saying here for some time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the senior Senator from Florida?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. The point is this: Under the tariff law there is a duty of $1 a thousand on dressed lumber. This bill is intended to cover rough lumber. It has not anything to do with dressed lumber, but it deals with rough lumber. Therefore it does not cover the same items.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. This amendment covers both dressed lumber and rough lumber. It takes rough lumber—which is one-half of the consumption of lumber in this country—off the free list and puts a tax of $3 a thousand feet on it. It takes dressed lumber, which has a tax of $1 and adds a tax of $3. I am amazed at the fact that Senators are voting for these tariff duties without understanding that they are cumulative duties.

Mr. FLETCHER. What the Senator proposes is to except flooring. The flooring generally used in our part of the country, and all over the country for that matter, is yellow pine. It is not a kind of flooring that now carries a duty. It is not birch or maple or hardwood at all. When we specify that we shall except flooring, that means all flooring; and therefore any kind of flooring that is not birch or maple, such as mentioned in the tariff law, would have no duty on it. We might as well put in the tariff law aluminum flooring, which would be just as distinct from pine as birch and maple.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, at the suggestion of the Senator from Washington I will modify my amendment so as to read as follows:

On line 7, page 244, after the word "sides," insert the following:

Except flooring made of maple (except Japanese maple), birch, and beech.

Mr. JONES. I think I am ready, so far as I am concerned, to accept that amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Let us have a vote on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is upon agreeing to the committee amendment as amended. On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to offer an amendment.

On page 244, line 9, strike out the period and insert a comma and add:

Provided, however, That a tax equal to one-half the amount herein stated shall be levied at the source and paid into the Treasury of the United States as a special tax.

Mr. President, the purpose of that amendment is this: The people who are asking for this $3 tariff on lumber will raise their price $3 a thousand feet on lumber; and, inasmuch as this is a revenue bill, is it too much to ask that at least half of the increase in price shall be paid into the Federal Treasury?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I was wondering if the Senator thought we could assess the foreigners where the lumber has its source.

Mr. TYDINGS. If it comes into this country, the foreigner will be assessed. He will have to pay $3 a thousand; but the American producer will have to pay $1.50 a thousand.

Mr. COUZENS. But we can not tax it at the source, because the source is in a foreign country.

Mr. TYDINGS. But no matter if it is not taxed at the source in a foreign country, the minute it comes over the border it is taxed, no matter what the source may have been. It is taxed $3 a thousand. If the foreign exporter is to be taxed $3 a thousand, thereby permitting all the American lumber producers to raise their price $3 a thousand, why should not these men who are benefited to the extent of that $3 raise share half of it with their Government in this hour of deficit?

Mr. COUZENS. I am unable to see how that could be executed, because prices would be varying all over the country, and we have no assurance that all of this lumber would be raised here.

Mr. TYDINGS. Whatever lumber comes within this category, at its source the owner of that lumber would be compelled to pay the Government a tax of half the amount he is benefited by this tariff.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator's contention, it would be this, that the foreign exporter from Canada into this country would pay the $3 when he sends it in?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is right.

Mr. JONES. And then every producer of lumber in this country would have to pay $1.50 a thousand?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is right, because we all know that the American producer is going to take $3 in special taxes from the American consumer.

Mr. JONES. We do not grant that at all.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then this tax would not be any good, and all of us are going to pay $3 a thousand more for our lumber. These poor, impoverished people for whom we bleed and plead every day, and 10,000,000 of whom are now out of employment, and have been out of employment for a year, and are now to be taxed to the extent of $1,200,000,000, are to pay a further tribute to the lumber companies in this hour of peril of $3 a thousand, and all I am asking is that half that sum at least go into the Federal Treasury, that the lumber people not be allowed to keep it all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment, which will be reported for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 244, line 9, after the word "articles," the Senator from Maryland proposes to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, however, That a tax equal to one-half the amount herein stated shall be levied at the source and paid into the Treasury of the United States as a special tax.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I want to offer an amendment to strike out the committee amendment on page 244, lines 6 to 9, and insert in place of that the following language:

Aluminum hydroxide or refined bauxite, one-fourth cent per pound, in lieu of tariff duties heretofore levied.

That deals with the aluminum schedule. We all know that no aluminum is imported into the country. There is a complete embargo on that article; and, of course, we all know that the Aluminum Co. is among the companies which in this day of depression has stood out as not being in great difficulty.

Inasmuch as that company have a monopoly in this country, without an ounce of aluminum coming in, I think we ought to reduce the tariff and permit a little competition and get a little revenue, and I would like to have a vote on that question.

I hope those sitting on this side of the aisle will permit a vote; but as I see many of those who might favor the amendment are absent, before we have the vote I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Jones	Sheppard
Austin	Cutting	Kean	Shipstead
Bailey	Dale	Kendrick	Shortridge
Bankhead	Davis	Keyes	Smith
Barbour	Dickinson	King	Smoot
Barkley	Dill	La Follette	Steiwer
Bingham	Fess	Logan	Stephens
Blaine	Fletcher	Long	Thomas, Idaho
Bratton	Frazier	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Brookhart	George	McNary	Townsend
Broussard	Goldsborough	Moses	Trammell
Bulkley	Hale	Neely	Tydings
Bulow	Harrison	Norbeck	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Hastings	Norris	Wagner
Capper	Hatfield	Nye	Walcott
Caraway	Hawes	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Carey	Hayden	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Cohen	Hebert	Reed	Watson
Connally	Howell	Robinson, Ark.	White
Coolidge	Hull	Robinson, Ind.
Copeland	Johnson	Schall

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-two Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, if I may withdraw the amendment, I would like to offer another in lieu of it, in order to clear up the wording of the committee amendment. On page 244, line 9, I move to strike out the period and insert a comma and the following:

Aluminum hydroxide or refined bauxite, one-fourth cent per pound, in lieu of existing duties.

In other words, that would reduce the tariff on aluminum 50 per cent. That is a product of which there are practically no imports. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate for but one moment, but I want to explain my vote.

In the Committee on Finance I opposed the inclusion of any tariff item in the pending bill. I have followed that course consistently in the Senate. Even though when the Hawley-Smoot bill was before us I voted for an amendment similar to that of the Senator from Maryland, and in conference tried to have such an amendment included in the bill, I do not feel justified at this time, in the consideration of this revenue bill, in voting for this tariff amendment or any amendment which seeks to reduce or increase any rate in the present law. In other words, by my votes I shall seek to keep this pending measure a revenue measure, and try to prevent having included in it any tariff items whatsoever.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRATTON (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. I do not know how he would vote on this particular motion, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. HATFIELD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON]. I do not know how he would vote, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], who is detained from the Senate on account of illness. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. BINGHAM. Has the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have a general paid with that Senator and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. WAGNER (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] who I understand has not voted. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] and let my vote stand.

Mr. FESS. The senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is necessarily detained from the Senate and is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—24

Barkley	Cohen	La Follette	Robinson, Ark.
Blaine	Connally	Logan	Shipstead
Brookhart	Cutting	McGill	Smith
Bulkley	George	Norbeck	Stephens
Bulow	Hull	Norris	Trammell
Caraway	King	Nye	Tydings

NOT VOTING—24

Austin	Byrnes	Hastings	Patterson
Bankhead	Costigan	Hatfield	Swanson
Bingham	Dale	Lewis	Thomas, Okla.
Black	Glass	McKellar	Townsend
Borah	Glenn	Metcalf	Waterman
Bratton	Gore	Morrison	Wheeler

So the amendment of Mr. TYDINGS to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I think the amendment just voted on has undoubted merit. In explanation of my vote, I would say that regardless of the merits or demerits of the amendment just voted on, my position is that I am opposed to all tinkering with the tariff in a revenue bill. I shall continue to vote against all tariff amendments to the pending bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I think it quite likely there is a general misunderstanding concerning the amendment just voted on. It was an amendment to reduce the duty on aluminum hydroxide, of which there are practically no importations into the country at all. It is quite different from the duty on aluminum, which is 5 cents per pound.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment: On page 244, line 9, strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following:

Potassium aluminum sulphate or potash alum and ammonium aluminum sulphate or ammonia alum, one-half cent per pound.

The present duty fixed by law is three-quarters of a cent per pound. This is a reduction of one-eighth of a cent per pound. I am going through the schedule. American business finds itself, so far as the concerns covered by these items go, more prosperous than the rest of the country. This is a very good time to find out whether or not we want to give the taxpayers a little relief and get a little revenue for the Government.

I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is absent. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BRATTON (when his name was called). Repeating my announcement of my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] as on the previous vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). Repeating my announcement that I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], I withhold my vote.

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HATFIELD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. WAGNER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Making the same announcement as on a previous vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]; and

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—23

Barkley	Cohen	La Follette	Shipstead
Blaine	Connally	Logan	Smith
Brookhart	Cutting	McGill	Stephens

So the amendment of Mr. TYDINGS to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in explanation of my vote I would say that regardless of the merits or demerits of the amendment just voted on, my position is that I am opposed to all tinkering with the tariff in a revenue bill. I shall continue to vote against all tariff amendments to the pending bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I propose the following amendment: On page 244, line 9, strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following:

Aluminum sulphate, alum cake, or aluminous cake, containing not more than 15 per cent of alumina and more iron than the equivalent of one-tenth of 1 per cent of ferric oxide, one-tenth cent per pound; containing more than 15 per cent of alumina or not more iron than the equivalent of one-tenth of 1 per cent of ferric oxide, one-sixth cent per pound; all other aluminum salts and compounds not specially provided for, 20 per cent ad valorem.

This is the aluminum itself. May I say to those who are present that there is no tariff in the whole schedule that is more deserving of a reduction than the aluminum tariff. It is a complete monopoly. All the people in America pay tribute to this big monopoly. At a time when the taxpayers are being burdened with these new imposts, let us give them a little break on aluminum. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, may I say that this is not by any means what is known as commercial aluminum at all. That is taken care of in an entirely different provision of the act. The item referred to by the Senator is taxed under paragraph 6 of the tariff act. The duty on aluminum is taken care of in an entirely different paragraph of the act.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, in view of the fact that so many Senators are explaining their vote, I want to say that I shall vote against every change in tariff rates where no hearing was held before the Committee on Finance.

I am surprised at Senators voting haphazardly to change tariff rates, especially in view of the fact that they advertise their fairness in wanting to give the public a chance to be heard. There is no opportunity for anyone interested in any of these proposed changes in rates to have a hearing before the Finance Committee. Therefore I am going to vote against all of the proposed amendments, not knowing anything about their merits.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there is much in the observation just submitted by the able Senator from Michigan. However, there are some Senators, and I think no inconsiderable number, who are familiar with the hearings heretofore had in connection with the 1930 act, the so-called Smoot-Hawley Act, as well as in connection with the act of 1923. Extensive hearings were conducted when both of those measures were under consideration not alone in the House but also in the Senate. I am sure that Senators are familiar—if they will think for a moment—with the testimony which was offered, all of which demonstrated, beyond peradventure of a doubt, that there was a monopoly in the case of the Aluminum Co. or Corporation in the United States and that that monopoly extended to what might be denominated ancillary commodities, which are constituent parts of the aluminum product itself.

I am sure that the commodities which were embraced in the two preceding amendments come within the purview of the observations which I have just made. They constitute a part, directly or indirectly, of aluminum, and they are controlled, directly or indirectly, by the Aluminum Trust.

If these were propositions de novo, as to which no hearings had been had and as to which no information were available, then the position taken by the able Senator from Michigan would be invincible, and we would all be compelled to assent to the conclusion which he announced.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I think, in view of the splendid condition which the country finds itself as a result of the operation of the present tariff law, a good many of us are justified in giving the people the benefit of the doubt and in voting whenever we can to modify or lower present tariff rates. Therefore every chance I get I am going to vote to do that thing. I think the practical result of the existing tariff law is so manifest to us all that we do not desire to have any more lobbyists before committees to tell us what we ought to do, when the vast public that pays the bill does not appear before the committees.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] flashed before the Senate 500 amendments which he intends to offer if an oil tariff shall be voted. It was practically the same as saying, "If you touch the Standard Oil Co., I will make it impossible for a bill to be passed at this session." I have no hesitation whatever in saying that I gladly will continue to vote against all amendments of this kind which may be offered.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am certainly delighted that we shall have that character of opposition. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the duty on aluminum is found in paragraph 374 of the tariff act, which reads as follows:

Aluminum, aluminum scrap, and alloys (except those provided for in paragraph 302) in which aluminum is the component material of chief value, in crude form, 4 cents per pound; in coils, plates, sheets, bars, rods, circles, disks, blanks, strips, rectangles, and squares, 7 cents per pound.

The paragraph to which this amendment is directed is paragraph 6, which is a subdivision of the schedule on chemicals, oils, and paint. I am very sure that Senators voting are unaware that this amendment does not relate to the ordinary commercial product of aluminum at all but to the chemical product.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there a second to the request for the yeas and nays?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I think what the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has said is true, except with this qualification: That all these chemicals are made in part from aluminum.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, since this bill came before us I have been approached by representatives of a great many interests in my State seeking increased tariff rates. Senators will remember the fight I made to have gypsum given tariff protection. I thought then, and I think now, that gypsum is entitled to such protection. There are other items—wires, fats, fish oils, and many other commodities—which should be protected, but I have said to all my constituents that I do not consider it a proper thing to have tariff items considered in this bill. That is my attitude, and it is my intention, no matter if items which are of interest to my State are presented here, whether they provide for increases or decreases, to vote against them all. I want the RECORD to show why the vote of "no" will come every time from my lips.

I am in bitter opposition to the inclusion of such items in a tax bill. If we will wait for another time and bring in a revision of the tariff, limited, I hope, if it ever comes again, then it will be my joy to give consideration to any tariff matter which may be presented; but at this time—I am not here to criticize any other Senator—because I feel it would be improper for me to vote for any tariff items, I shall vote against every such proposal which may be presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The yeas and nays are demanded. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRATTON (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement as to my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], I withhold my vote.

Mr. BULOW (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], and therefore withhold my vote. If the Senator from New Jersey were present, he would vote "nay," and if I were permitted to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last roll call with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HATFIELD (when his name was called). Repeating my previous statement respecting my general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON], I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS (when his name was called). I beg to announce that I am paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr.

BORAH]. I can go no further than announce the pair, the Senator from Idaho being absent on some official errand.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). Making the same announcement regarding my pair as heretofore, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement of my general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], I withhold my vote.

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. WAGNER (when his name was called). I am paired on this vote with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON]. I am not informed as to how he would vote if present. Therefore, I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. NORBECK. On this vote I am paired and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BYRNES. Repeating the announcement of my general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], I withhold my vote.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am authorized to state that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE].

The result was anounced—yeas 21, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—21

So Mr. TYDINGS's amendment to the amendment, reported by the committee, was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in explanation of my vote, I would say that regardless of the merits or demerits of the amendment just voted on, my position is that I am opposed to all tinkering with the tariff in a revenue bill. I shall continue to vote against all tariff amendments to the pending bill.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, my personal position on the vote just taken in that this is a tax bill, not a tariff bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the day's business the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG. Just a minute, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. The proposed agreement does not undertake to fix the time we shall recess to-night.

Mr. LONG. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, it may be asked why the Senator from Maryland is offering these amendments. There are two or three paragraphs that I should like to read as to the reasons for offering the amendments I have offered and those I still have to offer.

On June 1, 1931, Canada enacted the Bennett tariff budget in retaliation to the Hawley-Smoot bill. When custom ports opened their doors on June 2 over 200 imports were affected by a drastic upward revision of the tariff.

It was a Detroit of Canada budget, chiefly favoring the auto and steel industries.

Not Detroit in the United States, but a little town over in Canada.

Steel tariffs were boosted as high as $7 a ton. Imported autos carried duties up to 57½ per cent.

That is what Canada put on importations of automobiles from America.

Several hundred large United States corporations were immediately forced to establish Canadian subsidiaries to hold their valuable Canadian and British business.

The success of the Bennett budget was proven by the end of 1931, when Canada was the only large nation in the world selling more goods to the United States than she was buying from them, completely reversing her position of December, 1930, when she spent $36,077,187 in the United States and sold $26,155,348 to that country.

The complete development of Ojibway is expected to cost $60,000,000 and will enable the Canadian Steel Corporation to supply the bulk of $200,000,000 worth of steel which Canada now imports annually from the United States.

Investments of United States capital in Canada total $4,000,000,000 and include 1,200 branches of widely known United States industries.

It is estimated that $150,000,000 is invested in 130 United States plants in the Detroit of Canada. These industries make up an astounding list of names that are known throughout the world.

Here is a partial list of United States industries in this rapidly growing district—

And listen to the names—

Swedish Crucible Steel Co., DeVilbis Atomizer Co., Timken Roller Bearing Co., Minnesota Valley Canning Co., Goodyear Rubber Co., McCord Radiator Manufacturing Co., L. A. Young Industries, Berry Bros. Paint Co., Canadian Bridge Co., Penberthy Injector Co., Detroit Twist Drill Co., Vernors Ginger Ale Co., Truscon Steel Co., Lufkin Rule Co., Kelsey Wheel Co., Bayer Aspirin Co., General Foods Co., Herpicide Co., Sterling Products, Universal Cooler Co., Crane Co., Ferry-Morse Seed Co., C. H. Phillips Co., Hercules Products Co.

The Detroit manufacturer enjoys free trade with only the United States and its possessions, a market of 137,000,000 people. On practically all exports, he is faced with prohibitive duties at the foreign port.

The Detroit of Canada manufacturer not only benefits from the growing Canadian market but has free trade or preferential tariffs with the entire British Empire, totaling approximately 500,000,000 people—over one-fourth of the world's population.

Since we passed the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act 1,200 concerns have moved over into Canada. Now, listen to this illustration, which brings the thing home to us:

Under present tariff arrangements the auto * * * below would be shipped from the Detroit of Canada plant, through the St. Lawrence to Australia, at a saving of $400 over the same car shipped from the parent plant in Detroit to Australia.

In other words, an Australian can buy the same automobile from a Canadian manufacturer $400 more cheaply than he can buy it from an American manufacturer. The same thing applies to practically every branch of the British Empire. Therefore, where we once had a foreign trade in automobiles, because of the Smoot-Hawley Act it is gone. Where American workmen used to make those automobiles, they are now made in Canada. Where American dollars used to be invested in the United States, and pay American income taxes and excise taxes and State taxes and local taxes, that capital is now to some extent invested in Canada, where it is employing Canadian workmen, paying Canadian income taxes and Canadian local taxes, and where we are not deriving a single bit of revenue.

The United States has followed a high-tariff policy while Canada has extended its trade relations to 113 countries in every part of the world. Annual exports total $2,500,000,000, an increase of 50 per cent since 1922.

And is not this an astounding figure?

Since 1913 the growth of this trade has doubled the growth of United States export trade.

Do we want more of it? Shall we kill what little remaining world trade is left?

Here is a country which produces more than its people can consume. Its farmers raise enough food and cotton and other forms of clothing to supply a large part of the entire world. Unless the world can buy what the farmer raises, the farmer can not sell his products. Therefore, there is a surplus on the market; the price is depressed; and yet there are Senators here who are refusing to vote for a very slight decrease in some of the highest and most indefensible rates in the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act.

Already Canada has taken our world trade in automobiles. Already she has taken our world trade in radiators. Already she has taken our world trade in seeds. She has largely taken our world trade in canned food. She has taken our world trade in many other products, simply because American capital has been driven to jump over the Canadian tariff fence and invest its money in Canada and employ Canadian workmen, leaving just that many American workmen out of a job; and here we are increasing the tariff all over again, locking the world up in water-tight compartments. Each nation, as a result of our action, is attempting to follow suit; and we, in our water-tight compartment, think we are safe, little realizing that when civilization, the ship of the world, goes down, it will take our compartment to the bottom with it.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashhurst	Cohen	Hayden	Robinson, Ark.
Bailey	Connally	Howell	Robinson, Ind.
Bankhead	Coolidge	Hull	Sheppard
Barbour	Copeland	Johnson	Smith
Barkley	Costigan	Jones	Smoot
Bingham	Couzens	Kendrick	Steiwer
Blaine	Cutting	Keyes	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Davis	Logan	Thomas, Okla.

Bulkley	Frazier	Neely	Walsh, Mont.
Bulow	George	Oddie	Watson
Capper	Goldsborough	Pittman	Wheeler
Caraway	Hatfield	Reed	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, on page 244, line 9, I move to strike out the period, add a comma, and insert the following:

Ammonium carbonate and bicarbonate, 1½ cents per pound, in lieu of the existing duty.

Mr. President, the present rate is 2 cents a pound. This amendment represents a reduction of 25 per cent.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the Senator from Utah whether it is a fact that the Committee on Finance has determined to withdraw the proposed amendment, on page 245, imposing an import tax on rubber, and in place of that to impose taxes on rubber manufactures?

Mr. SMOOT. On tires and tubes—3 cents on tires and 5 cents on tubes.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is exactly the report I had heard, and, in view of the statement, I would like to have printed in the RECORD at this point a table showing the effect of that proposed tax on the regular standard weights of tires and tubes. This table has been furnished to me by the Rubber Manufacturers' Association, and at the proper time I would like to make some comments on the fairness of the proposed rate. But for the present I ask to have the table printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, at this time I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the State Democratic convention of the State of Wyoming indorsing my bill for the remonetization of silver, together with a letter from Mr. John P. Rusk, a lawyer of Newcastle, Wyo., a letter from Mr. C. F. Morris, a lawyer of Havre, Mont., and a petition signed by numerous persons in favor of the remonetization of silver.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEWCASTLE, WYO., May 14, 1932.

Hon. BURTON K. WHEELER,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I attach copy of resolution that was adopted May 9, 1932, by the Democratic Party at its State convention held at Casper, Wyo., on that date.

I presented the matter to our Weston County (Wyo.) Democratic convention May 3, 1932, where the resolution was unanimously adopted and our county delegation was instructed to present the matter to our State convention. As chairman of our county delegation, I drew up the resolution, had it presented to the resolutions committee of the State convention, which committee unanimously adopted it, and presented it to the convention itself, where it was again unanimously approved.

To give credit where it is due, permit me to say that the matter of this resolution was strongly called to my attention just a day or two before the date of our county convention by Mr. Elmer Goodson, Clareton, Weston County, Wyo. He told me that he had followed your efforts to help our money and credit condition closely and had circulated petitions in behalf of your bill in his community; that he had gotten signers just as fast as he could get to the voters with his petitions.

Unfortunately for our cause, the fact that our Democratic State convention unanimously adopted this resolution—in other words, went on record unanimously for the restoration of silver to its proper place in our monetary system—got no publicity at all. I doubt if it was mentioned in any of our newspapers. I believe I did see a line and a half or two lines in some news dispatch, but no comment, no publicity.

It is not at all likely that you will be able to get your bill up to a vote this session. Possibly next session the Members will be more responsive to the needs of the great body of the people. Possibly, also, and I believe it to be as near a certainty as anything ever gets to be in politics, we shall have Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt at the head of a Democratic national administration.

Please count on me for any help I can give you in the cause of silver.

For the work you have done you are entitled to the thanks of all of us.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN P. RUSK.

Whereas it is the well-considered opinion of students of our present-day economic conditions that the volume of money and credit in America must be expanded before there can be any lasting and real relief looked for: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Democrats of the State of Wyoming in regular convention assembled this 9th day of May, 1932, That there should be included in the platform to be adopted at the national convention of our party at Chicago in June of this year a declaration in favor of the restoration of silver to its historical place as money along the lines of Senate bill No. 2784, introduced by Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, of Montana, January 4, 1932, and now pending before that body.

Submitted to the resolutions committee of said Democratic State convention by the Weston County delegation under instructions unanimously adopted and given said delegation by the Weston County Democratic county convention held May 3, 1932.

JOHN P. RUSK,
Chairman Weston County Delegation.

HAVRE, MONT., January 9, 1932.

Hon. B. K. WHEELER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR B. K.: Any time within the last 20 years up to six months ago I would have considered the double standard as absolutely a dead issue, but I congratulate you on the forward act you have made in introducing the bill for the free coinage of silver. The gold standard is not sacred. It has failed to serve the country or the people satisfactorily. Silver is the coin of the common, humble citizen and its reestablishment in its former position is about all that is left that will rejuvenate the farming and producing classes. It will do everything for the country that you claim for it as reported in the Associated Press.

We are drifting without any definite objective and if something is not done to bring about conditions that are tolerable to the average man, hell will be popping in this country, and your free-silver proposition is the most promising of anything yet proposed. Put it through, revise the tariff down to a basis that will encourage trade, and resubmit the liquor question to the States for repeal by popular vote—by State conventions—and we will be on our way to a happy solution of all our political ills.

Cordially yours,

C. F. MORRIS.

We, the undersigned citizens of Roosevelt County, Mont., believing that agriculture is one of our basic industries and that the economic security of our Nation is dependent upon the economic security of the American farm, favor such legislation as will provide for the solvency of the American farmer.

We believe that the only way out of the present depression is to raise commodity price levels and thereby reduce the burden of debt. Under the present gold standard, debts contracted three years ago, if paid this year, would require three times the amount in farm commodities as when they were contracted. All of the important countries of the world except France have gone off the gold standard. It is therefore impossible for us to trade with them. This keeps commodity prices down.

We feel that if prosperity is to return to this country we must go off the gold standard, which is the cause of most of our present economic ills.

We therefore respectfully petition the Senate of the United States of America to pass the Wheeler silver bill, Senate bill No. 2487, which provides for the remonetization of silver by providing for free coinage of silver as well as gold at the fixed ratio of 16 to 1.

THE GOLD STANDARD, AND INDEBTEDNESS IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, while there is somewhat of a lull in the tariff debate, I desire to direct attention just for a moment or two to proceedings before the Committee on Banking and Currency last week, when Mr. Eugene Meyer, of the Federal Reserve Board, appeared as a witness against the Goldsborough bill. On that occasion I propounded to Mr. Meyer some questions respecting the possibility of the people discharging the indebtedness which now exists against governments, State and Federal, and private parties and private institutions. I called attention to the fact that, according to a survey made by the department of economics of the Agricultural College of the State of New York, the total indebtedness in the United States, public and private, amounts in round numbers to $203,000,000,000. I also find that the total assets of the United States, public and private, amount to about $200,000,000,000; in other words, that our indebtedness exceeds our assets. I was endeavoring to ascertain from Mr. Meyer how he thought the Government or the people could discharge that enormous debt.

In connection with the same proceeding, I made reference to the grave possibility of the United States going off the gold standard, and I pressed Mr. Meyer for an answer to or a discussion of that particular question.

I also suggested during the proceedings that governments sometimes, and oftentimes, went off the gold standard without any action by Congress or Parliament or any public authority; that in the very nature of things oftentimes a government found itself where it was no longer upon the monetary standard of gold. Mr. Meyer refused to answer those inquiries.

It is not my purpose to debate that question at this time, but rather it is my purpose to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Philadelphia Record of May 22, 1932, entitled "The Handwriting on the Wall," in which editorial I find this language:

> The handwriting on the wall becomes clearer.
>
> Within three months the United States must suspend gold payments.
> If the Government waits until its hand is forced it courts disaster.

It was that grave possibility of our Government facing disaster that prompted me to ask Mr. Meyer, who is a member of the Federal Reserve Board, and a part of the Government machinery which has to do with the monetary system of this country, whether it might not be possible for him to discuss that question, in order that we could avoid the very danger to which reference is made in this editorial. I ask, therefore, that the entire editorial which discusses this very grave situation, be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record, May 22, 1932]

HANDWRITING ON THE WALL

The handwriting on the wall becomes clearer.

Within three months the United States must suspend gold payment.

If the Government waits until its hand is forced it courts disaster.

If the Government acts now it can arrest deflation, end depression, win back prosperity within 60 days.

Six months ago the Record, alone among all the newspapers in the United States, urged a gold embargo and suspension of gold payment. We said:

"If the Government fails to take the initiative now, its hand will be forced eventually, too late to do much good."

The Record repeats its warning. It is not now alone in its conviction. Trained economists, experienced bankers, clear-thinking business leaders, are agreed there is only one way to prevent chaos. The facts are obvious. The Government has allowed deflation to go so far that only most heroic measures will arrest and reverse the process.

Increased value of the dollar has literally bankrupted the Nation. In 1928 our national wealth was estimated at nearly $400,000,000,000 as against less than $200,000,000,000 of indebtedness. To-day national wealth is estimated at less than $200,000,000,000.

Wealth of the Nation is just as great as it was in 1928. The value of the dollar has changed.

But the total debts remain at $200,000,000,000, so that our debts are greater than our wealth—expressed in dollars—which spells National bankruptcy and ruin.

The only way out of this absurdity is to change the value of the dollar.

This can not be done by mild inflation or making additional credit available to our banks and large industrial organizations. It can only be done by deliberate cheapening of the dollar. We use the words "cheapening the dollar" rather than "stabilizing the dollar" because "cheapening" is unpleasant. Now is the time to force unpleasant verities upon a public that has been fed on the pap that prosperity is around the corner.

This Nation is approaching a terrible crisis. Its fate depends on courage and intelligence in facing true facts and meeting them with its full strength.

We are in this terrible depression because the administration and Congress have failed to face facts. The administration has reluctantly and belatedly admitted the need of some inflation of our dwindling and sluggish currency. It has pretended that this mammoth task could be accomplished by "mild inflation," open market transactions of the Federal reserve banks.

It has thrown a sop to the inflationists by implying that the Federal reserve system is putting out new money through purchase of Government securities at the rate of $100,000,000 a week, and will continue this process until commodity prices are stabilized and deflation arrested.

Why not tell the truth?

At the rate gold is going out of the Federal reserve system, the Federal reserve banks will have to stop their open market transactions within six weeks. They will be pulled up short by dwindling gold reserve—the golden chain which has circumscribed any adequate action to cure the depression.

Hasn't the depression become big enough to be met in a big way? Can't the present situation be solved with the directness that Columbus showed when he smashed the end of an egg?

Why can't we fight this depression as we fought the war, when we declared an embargo on gold in 1917 and no one thought anything of it?

We should have put an embargo on gold to coincide in duration with the moratorium on allied debts.

It is obviously unfair to permit debtor nations to absorb our gold when they are not able to meet their national debt payments to us. President Hoover declared an embargo on allied debts but allows the subjects of these debtor nations to drain our gold and drive us toward destruction.

Is there anything sensible or ethical in such a course?

Are we in the grip of some strange obsession—the gold mentality, as Senator BORAH calls it—which makes us act irrationally whenever the precious metal is mentioned?

Since the depression became so intense that the administration could not pretend there was no depression, it has offered many remedies—all halfway measures.

Not one has succeeded in arresting depression and turning the tide.

The one possible exception is that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation did stop bank failures.

But unemployment is steadily increasing as volume of trade decreases. All statistical evidence of the economic position of this country grows more terrifying. Down come commodity price index, bank clearings, car loadings, stock and bond quotations.

This depression started in 1929. It has grown worse with increasing acceleration.

It is time that we acted with our full strength as we did in the war. Overnight Congress should give the President the right to declare a gold embargo, just as it gave that right to Woodrow Wilson in 1917. The President should act immediately on the power accorded him.

This should be followed by inflation on a war-time scale, so administered as to distribute purchasing power among the people.

INCOME-TAX ESTIMATES

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to Senate Resolution 214 (agreed to May 16, 1932), estimates of individual income taxes for the calendar year 1932 by detailed net income brackets, together with a table showing the individual income taxes on 1930 incomes by net income brackets, at rates, exemptions, credits, etc., as in the revenue act of 1918 and as in the 1928 revenue act, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I request that the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, with the accompanying table, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and the accompanying table were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 20, 1932.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I have Senate Resolution 214 requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish the Senate estimates for the calendar year 1932 of the revenue that would be raised by each of the income-tax brackets under the revenue act of 1918.

It is assumed that "estimates for the calendar year 1932 * * * under the revenue act of 1918" specified in the resolution refer to taxes on incomes for the calendar year 1932 which would be payable in the calendar year 1933 through application of the provisions of the 1918 act as applicable to incomes for the year 1918.

The Treasury estimates of individual income taxes are made for certain broad net income classes and the Treasury is of the opinion that estimates of taxes for detailed net-income classes are subject to a wide margin of error for any one of the various net-income classes. This difficulty is due to the variable and uncertain factors affecting the distribution of income by detailed net-income classes.

To comply with the request of the Senate, however, the Treasury estimates, made as stated by broad net-income classes, for collections which would be made in the calendar year 1933 (on 1932 incomes) have been distributed over more detailed net-income classes, as follows:

Net-income classes (thousand dollars)	Estimated collections, 1918 rates, calendar year 1933 (million dollars)
Under 5	156
5–10	94
10–25	152
25–50	110
50–100	100
100–150	54
150–300	73
300–500	40
500–1,000	43
1,000 and over	81
Total	903

In the opinion of the Treasury these estimates of revenue yield on 1932 incomes represent the maximum amount for that year under the 1918 rates, and the yield might be considerably below this total. It should be particularly noted that the yield for any one net-income class shown might vary considerably from the figure given.

These estimates indicate additional revenue for the fiscal year 1933 over that provided in the Senate bill aggregating $193,000,000. The estimates are exclusive of additional amounts to be derived from the limitation of security losses and of other largely administrative income-tax provisions in the Senate bill.

The incidence of taxes as under the 1918 act (as applied to incomes for the year 1918), by net-income classes, as compared with the incidence of taxes at present rates, may be illustrated by applying these two sets of provisions to the actual income data returned for 1930. There is inclosed a table showing the individual income tax on 1930 incomes by net-income classes at rates, exemptions, credits, etc., as in the revenue act of 1918 and as in the 1928 act. These computations take no account of the effect of administrative changes affecting the deduction for losses from sales of securities, etc.

This table, based on statistics for 1930 incomes, is of value merely for the purpose of comparing the relative effect of the two sets of income-tax provisions by net-income classes. Incomes for 1930, of course, can not be used as an indication of the incomes on which taxes will be collected in 1933 on 1932 incomes.

Very truly yours,

OGDEN L. MILLS,
Secretary of the Treasury.

President of the Senate, Washington, D. C.

DUTY ON SULPHATE OF AMMONIA

Mr. BANKHEAD presented a letter from Hugh Morrow, president of the Sloss-Sheffield Steel & Iron Co., of Birmingham, Ala., which, with the accompanying paper, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SLOSS-SHEFFIELD STEEL & IRON CO.,
Birmingham, Ala., May 17, 1932.

Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BANKHEAD: Several Members of Congress have made recent statements, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, protesting against imposition of duty on sulphate of ammonia. These statements have been in connection with investigation by the Treasury Department under the antidumping statute.

Whereas these Congressmen on behalf of their constituents in the South are protesting against what they term a "tariff," in reality the Government proposes to determine whether sulphate is being "dumped" into the United States at prices injurious to American producers. It is common knowledge that the low level of prices prevailing this season is the lowest in history for this product; prices are so ruinous that the American producer is sustaining actual "out-of-pocket" loss on every ton of sulphate sold to-day.

The official statistics published by the United States Department of Labor show that the price of sulphate has declined to a greater extent than other fertilizer materials and also than the average farm product; in fact, there are very few individual commodities which have declined as much as or more than sulphate. As a consequence the sulphate producer is at a greater disadvantage and is suffering greater losses than agriculture generally. It is no more than fair that the American producer should not have his market taken from him by foreign producers who intentionally "dump" their material in this country.

It is not a tariff that is being urged, nor is any attempt being made to prevent sulphate from being properly imported. It is the claim of American producers that European producers are sending their material over here in large quantities at prices less than they sell to their own consumers; this practice of "dumping" is unfair to the American producer, and that is the very thing the antidumping laws enacted by Congress were intended to prevent.

If the Government finds there is dumping of foreign sulphate, the law provides for the payment of a dumping duty by those guilty of its violation. Any such duty, of course, would be a source of revenue to the United States. If there is no dumping, the sulphate may be freely imported.

There have been reports of a shortage of sulphate, but it is believed this claim is unfounded, with the possible exception of a few localities where for the moment a comparatively small supply is on hand. This temporary situation, it is reported, has occasioned a price increase on sulphate in some cases. If such cases exist, the increase must have been made by resellers and not American producers, as the latter have not increased their price.

Yours very truly,

HUGH MORROW, President.

EXTENSION OF RECONSTRUCTION CORPORATION ACT TO PUERTO RICO

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I have received a communication from the secretary of the Senate of Puerto Rico, forwarding a concurrent resolution unanimously approved by that senate and also by the house of representatives of the island, which, being in the nature of a petition or memorial, I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENADO DE PUERTO RICO.

I, Jose Muñoz Rivera, secretary of the Senate of Puerto Rico, do hereby certify that the following concurrent resolution was unanimously approved by the Senate of Puerto Rico on March 2, 1932, and by the House of Representatives on April 1, 1932:

"Concurrent resolution requesting the President and the Congress of the United States of America to extend to Puerto Rico the act creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation

"Whereas on January 22, 1932, the Congress of the United States approved H. R. 7360, creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to provide financial facilities to agriculture, commerce, and industry;

"Whereas the benefits that said act will report to the United States will be efficacious because of the great facilities the act provides to industry, commerce, and agriculture, the chief sources of the nation's business and progress;

"Whereas said powerful organization, with its adequate resources, is prepared to strengthen credit by giving vitality to financial institutions, industry, agriculture, and commerce, and by supplying power to create new activities relieving the problem of unemployment;

"Whereas for many years the financial condition of Puerto Rico has been critical, it being difficult to obtain cash to finance business, several banks having been forced to close, thus augmenting the crisis, creating difficulties for labor and obstructing the finances of industry, commerce, and agriculture in Puerto Rico;

"Whereas the present condition of business will not permit industry, commerce, and agriculture in Puerto Rico to pay the rate of interest demanded of them, it having been claimed that the market conditions for the agricultural products of the country will not permit cane planters to cover cost of production;

"Whereas the true husbandmen of the principal industry of cane sugar claim that the sugar-market outlook is quite discouraging and that the situation created will not allow them to increase the efficiency of production, this condition causing a great increase of the unemployment existing at present in the country;

"Whereas the Legislature of Puerto Rico offers to exempt from all kinds of taxes all such negotiable instruments as may be issued in good faith for the purpose of obtaining additional cash from the continental United States at a low rate of interest and on easy payments, and offers to authorize the treasurer of Puerto Rico to accept such documents as collateral to secure deposits of the insular government of Puerto Rico: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of Puerto Rico (the house of representatives concurring), To request the President of the United States of America and the other authorities concerned with the execution of legislation creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to have such legislation made extensive to the island; and in case that, in construing said legislation, Puerto Rico is not considered as included, to request the President of the United States of America to forward to Congress a special message asking that said legislation be extended to Puerto Rico.

"SEC. 2. That upon approval the original of this resolution be forwarded to his Excellency the President of the United States, and a copy thereof to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives; the chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Board; the Resident Commissioner for Puerto Rico in Washington; Senator BINGHAM, General Parker; Hon. HENRY B. STEAGALL, president of the House Committee on Banks; Hon. PETER NORBECK, president of the Senate Committee on Banks; and all members of the Committees on Banks of the Senate and of the House of Representatives for their knowledge and action."

For transmittal to the Hon. HIRAM BINGHAM, president of the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, as provided in the second paragraph of said concurrent resolution, I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the seal of the Senate of Puerto Rico on this, the 5th day of April, A. D. 1932.

[SEAL.] _____ _____,

Secretary of the Senate.

ADDITIONAL BILL INTRODUCED

Mr. BULKLEY introduced a bill (S. 4738) for the relief of Newport Contracting & Engineering Co. (with accompanying papers), which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PURCHASE AND MERCHANDISING OF WHEAT AND COTTON

Mr. SMITH. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution. It is short, and I should like to have it printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 163) to provide for the purchase and merchandising of wheat and cotton by the Secretary of Agriculture was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed to make available to the Secretary of Agriculture the sum of $250,000,000, less any amounts expended by the Secretary of Agriculture pursuant to section 2 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. Such sum, together with the balance of the amounts made available to the Secretary of Agriculture under section 2 of such act, shall be used for the purchase and merchandising of wheat and cotton as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to use not to exceed one-half of such amounts made available by this act for the purchase of wheat through such agencies as he may designate, under rules and regulations prescribed by him. The wheat so purchased may be withheld for such times, or may be sold or otherwise disposed of in such amounts and at such times, as in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture will best promote the public interest.

SEC. 3. (a) The Secretary of Agriculture is further authorized and directed to use not to exceed one-half of the amounts made available by this act for the purchase of cotton through such agencies as he may designate, under rules and regulations prescribed by him. The cotton so purchased shall be resold on credit to producers of cotton at a price not to exceed the market price at the time of such purchase, but only if such purchasers enter into agreements with the Secretary of Agriculture to produce not to exceed 50 per cent of the amount of cotton produced by them during the crop year 1931. No such producer shall be entitled to purchase any cotton on credit from the Secretary of Agriculture in an amount in excess of 50 per cent of the amount of the cotton produced by him during the crop year 1931.

(b) In the event that any such cotton resold on credit to any such producer is subsequently sold at a price in excess of the price paid therefor by the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Agriculture shall pay to such producer, or shall apply toward any loans made to such producer by the Secretary of Agriculture, the difference between the amount received on such subsequent sale and the amount of such original purchase price less deductions for insurance and storage charges and interest at not to exceed 4 per cent per annum on such original purchase price; and each agreement made under subdivision (a) shall so provide.

(c) Any person who shall knowingly make any material false representation for the purpose of obtaining any cotton under this act or in connection with the purchase or resale of any such cotton, or who shall knowingly violate any agreement entered into with the Secretary of Agriculture, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $—— or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or both, and the rights of such person under any agreement entered into with the Secretary of Agriculture shall thereupon be forfeited.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland to the committee amendment.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, during the dinner hour, while many Senators are out of the Chamber, if I may for just a few moments, I would like to offer some remarks which I have to present on the pending bill. I will avail myself of this time instead of some other time.

When the panic broke in October, 1929, it was about six weeks before Congress convened in the following December. At that time there was a great mountain of profits accruing for the calendar year 1929. The question naturally presented itself to Congress and to the Treasury as to whether the panic was of such nature and extent and intensity as would be reasonably calculated to interfere with the condition of the Treasury. No one connected with the Treasury seemed to be conscious of the possibilities of danger to the Treasury from the effects of the panic, which had then been raging for some six weeks.

If the Treasury had suggested a good, healthy, special tax levy on that great mountain of profits for 1929, one-half of which would have been paid into the Treasury as late as the fiscal year, 1931, ending June 30 last, there could have been saved to the Treasury out of that immense reservoir of profits a large portion of the amount that was necessary to avoid a corresponding deficit.

I recall, if I may refer to the incident, which is interesting in a way, that in the summer of 1918, after this country had entered the war and one war revenue act had been passed, the question came up as to whether the Government should undertake to make a real, far-reaching levy off the great mountain of war profits that would accrue during the calendar year 1918.

A few of us very insistently urged that Congress, instead of adjourning in May, 1918, when it had convened in brief extra session, should remain in continuous session and take up the immense task of drafting and enacting a far-reaching war revenue bill that would be calculated to appropriate a substantial percentage of war profits, and turn them into the Treasury for purposes of war expenses.

We agreed if the Democratic Congress undertook this immense task in the spring and summer and fall of 1918, that in all probability we would be thrown out of power and out of the control of Congress as the result of this immense tax-levy undertaking. The matter was pursued, however, with the result that in February, 1919, a levy of $6,000,000,000, mainly on the swollen war profits, became a law by action of Congress and the approval of the President.

By that time the fighting part of the war was ended, with the result that it was decided by those in control to apply these extreme rates to the calendar year 1918 alone, raise $6,000,000,000, and then lower the rates for subsequent years, graduated to the basis of 40 and 65 per cent, I think it was, for excess-profits taxes and with graduated rates running as high as 65 per cent for purposes of income taxes, but reducing the normal tax rate from 6 and 12 to 4 and 8.

In the fall of 1929 the Treasury entirely passed by this opportunity to levy many hundreds of millions of taxes out of the immense profits of 1929. Instead of that, just the opposite course was pursued. A resolution was passed through the Congress lowering taxes instead of increasing them, lowering them on the swollen profits of 1929. The idea was to relieve the panic condition by reducing the income taxes $160,000,000. I think $80,000,000 of that came off the corporations, about $28,000,000 came off of small individuals with incomes under $10,000, and the other $40,000,000 came off of the larger surtax payers. But most of the membership of the Senate on both sides of the aisle, with the exception of about 14 or 15, as I recall, joined in that movement to relieve the panic by enacting the joint resolution reducing all corporate taxes and all income taxes.

The panic progressed and the Treasury gradually became depleted, and still through 1930 the Treasury seemed unaware that a crisis was on hand or was possible in the future. When the Congress again convened in December, 1930, instead of demanding a special assessment on the profits of 1930, one-half of those for 1929 having come over into 1930, especially as to all companies and taxpayers having a fiscal year which included a part of 1930, still the Treasury as late as December, 1930, appeared oblivious of the danger that was ahead in the Government's finance.

Instead of demanding rigid economy in December, 1929, or in December, 1930, or instead of any branch of the administration sounding the alarm during that long period of 14 months while the panic was pending and demanding the launching of a far-reaching program of economy and retrenchment, the Treasury proceeded wholly indifferent or oblivious to the seriousness and the extreme danger of its condition. They predicted instead that while they had a deficit of $180,000,000 for the ensuing fiscal year, which was then half out, they would have a surplus of $30,000,000 for the succeeding fiscal year, 1932.

The result has been that instead they had a deficit of $906,000,000 for the fiscal year 1931 and a deficit that will range from $2,750,000,000 to $3,000,000,000 for the fiscal year 1933 instead of the surplus of $30,000,000 that was predicted by the Treasury at the middle of the fiscal year 1931.

Mr. President, I have mentioned this phase in order to consider one or two important, as I think, features which present themselves. I do not think any Member of this body is fully aware of the extreme demand on the part of the American people generally for the most rigid and far-reaching program of economy and retrenchment, in the first place, and then the very minimum of taxes to supplement that program of economy to the extent that would be necessary to meet the requirements of the Treasury.

There has been much said about balancing the Budget. Of course, the Budget does not have to be balanced every day or every week or every month or necessarily every year. The Budget only has to be balanced sufficiently often and under such circumstances as will carry assurance to the general public that the Government is able to pay its obligations and is capable of doing it whenever the occasion may make it necessary. Then confidence remains among the business and other people of the country and the Government proceeds as usual.

But a chorus, almost an anvil chorus, about balancing the Budget was set up in different parts of the country some months ago, with the result that everybody was going about echoing the demand, "Balance the Budget." Ninety per cent of them do not know what the Budget is; but they have all have been busy crying out, "Balance the Budget," forgetting everything else.

I am not minimizing the importance of that phase, but I am undertaking to indicate that the attempt to balance the Budget was really overdone, with the result that many people imagined that the Government was not really capable of meeting its obligations. I have often wondered how much more cheerfully the American people would pay a reasonable amount of taxes if they knew those taxes would be judiciously expended, compared to the painful state of mind that is created to-day whenever the taxgatherer comes around.

In the first place the people are entitled to honest and equitable taxation, with the receipts judiciously and economically expended. With that done the people then have no right whatever to complain about the payment of taxes.

If they would stop and see what it cost each family to furnish its own police protection, if they would figure how much it would cost each family to protect itself from contagious diseases in the community, if they would stop and see what it would cost each family to go over the cowpaths and trails for lack of any highway that would be suitable to travel, if they would stop and see what it would cost each family by itself to educate its own children; in other words, if the American people would halt and reexamine the whole phase of their fiscal affairs, taxes, expenditures, debts, they would readily see that, while it is painful to pay taxes in a sense, the country and the general public would plunge practically into anarchy and organized society would go back to the most primitive conditions if it were not for the payment of taxes which result in all these wonderful benefits and blessings that come to every class of people and every gradation of human society as a result of government.

We have listened to conversation here for days and weeks as though the Federal Government was the only governmental agency levying a tax and that the only tax to be levied related to income taxes, graduated and other taxes on incomes, including corporations. As a matter of fact, the Federal Government is only levying 30 per cent of the taxes that rest on the American people to-day. The States, counties, and municipalities are levying and collecting 70 per cent of the taxes, and yet the discussion ranges along lines that assume that the Federal Government alone imposes whatever amount of taxes the American people are expected to pay. The municipalities and counties levy over $7,000,000,000 of taxes and the States nearly $2,000,000,000.

All together we have a tax levy in this Nation of $10,250,000,000, and we have expenditures of all kinds for all purposes of government—Federal, State and local—of $13,000,000,000. The same 123,000,000 American people must pay this $10,250,000,000 of taxes. It makes no difference to them whether it is a Federal tax or a State, county, or municipal tax. They know they are obliged to pay it and they are only concerned in the proper distribution, in the equity of the tax as a whole, and in the aggregate, whereas we are overlooking that fact to a very large extent. Agriculture alone is paying $900,000,000 of tax under this monstrous and iniquitous and inequitable general property tax, around 25 per cent of all the income that they can rake and scrape together during this panic period. And yet there has been no concerted effort on the part of officials anywhere to coordinate our Federal and State and county and municipal fiscal affairs as they relate to expenditures and taxes and debts. Each agency in its own independent way is proceeding to a large extent.

I desire, if I may without imposing on those who are required to remain in the hall anyway, to call attention to one paragraph in a speech delivered by me back in 1925 on the subject of a program to coordinate the whole fiscal affairs of the Federal, State, county, and municipal governments, to cut out waste, establish policies of retrenchment and economy, make vast reductions in expenditures, and furnish corresponding relief to the taxpayers. Back in 1925, on December 9, in the House of Representatives, I said:

> The task ahead, it seems to me, is for the Federal Government, the States, and their localities, by concerted action, to work out a coordinated and uniform system of taxation as nearly as may be feasible, comprising a combination of such tax methods as will be best calculated to reach every class of persons for an amount of taxes suggested by ability to pay, and which will both yield the necessary amount of revenue and work the fullest measure of equity to each class of taxpayers and every section of the country. We sometimes hear much opposition to Federal cooperation with the States in certain respects. I have in mind one kind of cooperation in which I strongly believe. I refer to the creation of a Federal agency of efficiency and on coordination and uniformity in taxation and expenditures—Federal, State, county, and municipal.
> The Federal agency would cooperate with similar State agencies and would be comprised of experts, such as an outstanding accountant, who could establish accurate and uniform accounting systems and budget systems in every large and small municipality and county in America; an outstanding tax expert, who would go into the States and, in conjunction with a State associate, present uniform inheritance and other tax methods such as would be most suitable for the States, counties, and municipalities, respectively, and such as would dovetail into the Federal tax situation, thereby eliminating pro tanto many of the harsh, inequitable, and grinding phases of the personal and much of the general property-tax situations; and an efficiency engineer, such as Colonel Sherrill, who understands all phases of the duties of city manager, who would, with his State associate, visit the various municipalities and install innumerable efficiency methods with respect to all departments calling for expenditures, including uniform methods in the construction of public buildings, including school buildings, roads, etc. Such cooperative agency, in brief, could, in my judgment, work wonders in cutting out waste and promoting efficiency in these and in many other respects, and their work possible to be performed would within three or four years result in cutting our general burden of taxes and expenditures at least $1,000,000,000 to $3,000,000,000.

Mr. President, I have been urging such a policy of Government financing—Federal, State, and local—during all these years in repeated addresses at the other end of the Capitol and in a statement issued last October. Instead of any steps designed to bring order out of chaos, we find that debts and expenditures and taxes have literally run riot during recent years; we find that all States, counties, and municipalities are hopelessly in debt; that over $1,000,000,000 have been defaulted either in interest or amortization during the past 12 months; that conditions are growing steadily worse, with a corresponding detrimental effect upon private credit and other conditions.

We find at the same time, Mr. President, that while the condition of our State and local indebtedness has become precarious to a vast extent, the problem of retrenchment of expenditures has not been thoroughly grappled with by the proper State and local authorities. We are floundering through this panic with more taxes imposed than the people are by any means able to pay, and with increasing defaults of all governmental agencies, while debts have gone almost to an unthinkable discount in many cases.

My position is that we should start right here at Washington, in the Federal Treasury, where no living person except a very few expert accountants know how to read the balance sheet of the Treasury Department. There are blended hopelessly all kinds of items relating to expenditures, including authorizations, appropriations, and Treasury balances, permanent items of appropriation and temporary items of appropriation, appropriations for productive purposes and appropriations for nonproductive purposes, all jumbled and confused hopelessly together.

My view is, and for long years has been, that there should be developed a system of modern accounting in the Federal Treasury in order that any citizen of America could take up the balance sheet and see at least what the normal or annually recurring expenditures of the Government are from time to time; that he could look on the other side and find another column embracing all extraordinary receipts and expenditures and containing all the temporary or extraordinary items to which I have referred.

Then we would know what temporary taxes were needed in order to meet a temporary Treasury demand. We would know just about the level of our annually recurring expenditures and be able to adjust our tax structure so as to meet it and to meet it with such accuracy as the British Government have always been able to forecast their budget and make the tax receipts meet it to a most surprising extent. But we have not such certainty; we have chaos in our whole accounting situation—Federal, State, county, and municipal. There is no effort to coordinate either taxes or debts or expenditures. There is vast duplication of expenditures; there is necessarily an immense amount of waste; and, unless we adopt a systematic program to attack this condition resolutely and with thoroughly capable forces—forces furnished by the Government and the States in concert—we can not hope, Mr. President, to attain that level of retrenchment and economy which the American taxpayers have a right to expect us to reach, despite the demands for outlays on the part of the Government.

There has been a great deal said here about the exemption of various properties from taxation. Mr. President, it is surprising to see how a great people will complacently float along and with open eyes see a vast mountain of $60,000,000,000 worth of property develop under tax-free authority. This Nation to-day has about $34,000,000,000 of Federal, State, county, and municipal bonds that are tax free, except the long-term bonds of the Federal Government, amounting to in the neighborhood of $12,000,000, which are still subject to the surtax which was authorized in 1918.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that so long as I am a Member of this body, I shall consistently oppose a policy that will contract away the power to tax wealth in this country. I mean that in no invidious sense, for no person living can ever accuse me of being a baiter of wealth. I have always, in connection with my legislative duties and otherwise, undertaken to deal fairly with every class of business in every part of this country; but I am opposed, Mr. President, to creating by law a great oligarchy or aristocracy of wealth in this country which will be immune from all tax burdens, Federal, State, and local, so that, no matter what the emergency, no matter if the very life of the Republic should call for sudden and ruthless taxation, the small coterie, owning this great mass or mountain of $60,000,000,000 of wealth, can sit back and challenge the remainder of the country to defend and protect it.

It is imagined sometimes by some persons that tax exemption itself is equivalent to such taxes as would otherwise be imposed and collected. The truth has been thoroughly tried out, Mr. President, and it has been demonstrated that in no case does the benefit of the exemption offset the loss of the tax.

I merely wanted to call attention to that phase of the subject and to say that so long, as in this country, we proceed carelessly and indifferently to pile up an immense amount on an increasing scale of tax-exempt wealth, we are pursuing a hopelessly unsound, and, I fear, a seriously dangerous policy.

Mr. President, I must not tax the patience of the Senate further. There are several other phases of the subject of financing as it relates to our tax and debt and expenditure problems that I would have preferred further to discuss, but a proper respect for the patience of my colleagues forbids me to proceed at greater length at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand the pending amendment is the committee amendment putting a tariff on lumber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has already offered an amendment to that amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. I withdraw my amendment temporarily, and, in order that we may come quickly to a vote, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Copeland	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.
Bailey	Costigan	Jones	Schall
Bankhead	Couzens	Kean	Sheppard
Barbour	Cutting	Kendrick	Shipstead
Barkley	Davis	Keyes	Shortridge
Bingham	Dickinson	King	Smith
Blaine	Dill	La Follette	Smoot
Borah	Fess	Logan	Steiwer
Bratton	Frazier	Long	Thomas, Idaho
Brookhart	George	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Broussard	Goldsborough	McNary	Townsend
Bulow	Hale	Moses	Trammell
Byrnes	Harrison	Neely	Tydings
Capper	Hastings	Norbeck	Vandenberg
Caraway	Hatfield	Norris	Walcott
Carey	Hawes	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Cohen	Hayden	Oddie	Watson
Connally	Hebert	Reed	Wheeler
Coolidge	Hull	Robinson, Ark.	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. JONES. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask to have the amendment stated.

Mr. REED. Let it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as amended will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee amendment as amended is on page 244, commencing with line 6, and reads:

(6) Lumber, rough, or planed or dressed on one or more sides, except flooring made of maple (except Japanese maple), birch, and beech, $3 per thousand feet, board measure; but the tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. This is the committee amendment on lumber?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the committee amendment on lumber, as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], which was carried. It is the committee amendment on lumber as amended. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is unavoidably detained. If he were present, I understand that he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BROOKHART (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. If he were present, he would vote "yea"; and if I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BULOW (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. If he were present, I understand he would vote "yea," and if I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CAREY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY]. If he were present, he would vote "nay"; and if I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. If he were present, I understand that he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HATFIELD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and will vote. I vote "yea." The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], if present, would also vote "yea." He is necessarily absent.

Mr. KEAN (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. NEELY (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. If he were present, he would vote "nay"; and if I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. NORBECK (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and therefore withhold my vote. If the Senator from Florida were present, he would vote "yea"; and if I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as formerly, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate on account of illness. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COPELAND. My colleague [Mr. WAGNER] is unavoidably detained. He is paired upon this question. If he were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BRATTON. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who is necessarily absent. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BYRNES. I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. If present, he would vote "yea." If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TYDINGS. On this question I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], who is ill. I am unable to secure a transfer. If the Senator from Rhode Island were present, he would vote "yea"; and if I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. If present, the Senator from Missouri would vote "yea."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON] are necessarily absent from the city.

Mr. HULL. I announce the necessary absence of my colleague the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] because of illness.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (after having voted in the negative). In order to be able to enter a motion for reconsideration, I change my vote from "nay" to "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—36

Ashurst	Hale	Long	Shortridge
Bailey	Hatfield	McGill	Smoot
Capper	Hawes	McNary	Steiwer
Caraway	Hayden	Moses	Thomas, Idaho
Connally	Hebert	Oddie	Trammell
Couzens	Johnson	Reed	Vandenberg
Davis	Jones	Robinson, Ind.	Walcott
Dill	Kendrick	Sheppard	Watson
Goldsborough	Keyes	Shipstead	White

NAYS—24

Barbour	Copeland	Harrison	Nye
Barkley	Costigan	Howell	Robinson, Ark.
Blaine	Cutting	Hull	Schall
Borah	Fess	La Follette	Smith
Cohen	Frazier	Logan	Walsh, Mass.
Coolidge	George	Norris	Wheeler

NOT VOTING—36

Austin	Byrnes	Kean	Pittman
Bankhead	Carey	King	Stephens
Bingham	Dale	Lewis	Swanson
Black	Dickinson	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Fletcher	Metcalf	Townsend
Brookhart	Glass	Morrison	Tydings
Broussard	Glenn	Neely	Wagner
Bulkley	Gore	Norbeck	Walsh, Mont.
Bulow	Hastings	Patterson	Waterman

So the amendment of the committee, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I now enter a motion for a reconsideration of the vote just cast.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 318, after line 4, the Senator from Nebraska proposes to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 1109a.

EXPORT DEBENTURES

(a) Whenever the board provided for in the agricultural marketing act approved June 15, 1929, finds it advisable, in order to carry out the policy declared in section 1 of said agricultural marketing act, with respect to any agricultural commodity, to issue export debentures with respect to such commodity, said board shall give notice of such finding to the Secretary of the Treasury. Upon the receipt of such notice it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, commencing and terminating at such time as the board shall prescribe, to issue export debentures to any farmer, cooperative association, stabilization corporation, or other person with respect to such quantity of the commodity or any manufactured food product thereof or any product manufactured from cotton or tobacco, if the cotton or tobacco out of which it is manufactured if exported in the raw material would have been entitled to receive a debenture therefor, as such person may from time to time export from the United States to any foreign country. The export debenture shall be in an amount to be computed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in accordance with such regulations as he may prescribe, at the debenture rate for the commodity or product that is in effect at the time of exportation. Any such computation shall be final.

(b) In order to procure the issuance of an export debenture, the farmer, cooperative association, stabilization corporation, or other person shall, in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, make application for such debenture and submit satisfactory proofs either (1) that the commodity to be exported was produced in the United States and has not previously been exported therefrom, or (2) that the commodity used in making the manufactured food product or any product manufactured from cotton or tobacco, if the cotton or tobacco out of which it is manufactured if exported in the raw material would have been entitled to receive a debenture therefor, to be exported was produced in the United States and the agricultural commodity and the manufactured food product or any product manufactured from cotton or tobacco if the cotton or tobacco out of which it is manufactured if exported in the raw material would have been entitled to receive a debenture therefor, have not previously been exported therefrom.

(c) An export debenture, when presented by the bearer thereof within one year from the date of issuance, shall be receivable at its face value by any collector of customs, or deputy collector of customs, or other person authorized by law or by regulation of the Secretary of the Treasury to perform the duties of collector of customs, in payment of duties collectible against articles imported by the bearer. Title to any export debenture shall be transferable by delivery. In order to prevent any undue speculation in the handling of such export debentures, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to provide for the redemption of such export debentures from any money in the Treasury derived from the payment of duties collectible against articles imported into the United States at a rate of not less than 98 per cent of the face value of such export debentures.

(d) Debenture rates in effect at any time with respect to any agricultural commodity shall be one-half the rate of duty in effect at such time with respect to imports of such commodity, except that so long as no import duty is imposed on cotton the debenture rate thereon shall be 2 cents per pound. The debenture rate in effect at any time with respect to any manufactured food product of any agricultural commodity or any product manufactured from cotton or tobacco if the cotton or tobacco out of which it is manufactured if exported in the raw material would have been entitled to receive a debenture therefor, shall be an amount sufficient, as nearly as may be, to equal the debenture that would be issuable upon the exportation of the quantity of the agricultural commodity consumed in the manufacture of the exported manufactured food product, or any product manufactured from cotton or tobacco if the cotton or tobacco out of which it is manufactured if exported in the raw material would have been entitled to receive a debenture therefor, as prescribed and promulgated from time to time by said board.

(e) Regulations requiring that metal tags or other appropriate markings be placed on all bales of cotton produced in foreign countries and allowed transit through the United States for exportation, may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. Every person who violates any such regulation of said board shall be liable to a civil penalty of $100 for each such offense. Such penalty may be recovered in a civil suit brought by said board in the name of the United States.

(f) The Secretary of the Treasury shall prepare and issue all export debentures. Export debentures issued under authority of this act shall be obligations of the United States within the definition in section 147 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909, as amended (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 261).

(g) Any person who shall make any false statement for the purpose of fraudulently procuring, or shall attempt in any manner fraudulently to procure, the issuance or acceptance of any export debenture, whether for the benefit of such person or of any other person, shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

(h) In order to prevent undue stimulation in the production of any debenturable agricultural commodity, whenever said board finds that the production of any debenturable agricultural commodity during any crop years has exceeded the average annual production of such debenturable agricultural commodity for the preceding five years said board shall by proclamation prescribe that during the next succeeding year the export debenture rates for such commodity shall be reduced by the percentage hereinafter fixed. Such reductions shall become effective on the date fixed in such proclamation, not less than 60 days from the date of the issuance thereof, and shall remain in effect throughout such succeeding crop year. The term "crop year," as used in this section, means a 12 months' period beginning at a time designated by said board.

Reductions in debenture rates under this section shall be made in accordance with the following percentages:

(1) For an increase in production of less than 20 per cent, there shall be no reduction.

(2) For an increase in production of 20 per cent but less than 40 per cent, there shall be a reduction of 20 per cent.

(3) For an increase in production of 40 per cent but less than 60 per cent, there shall be a reduction of 50 per cent.

(4) For an increase in production of 60 per cent but less than 90 per cent, there shall be a reduction of 75 per cent.

(5) For an increase in production of 90 per cent or more, there shall be a reduction of 99 per cent.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, to-morrow morning, when the Senate convenes, I intend to ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution that Congress confer upon Amelia Earhart Putnam the congressional medal of honor for her achievements in the air, her latest accomplishment being a flight over the Atlantic in a plane by herself.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, would it be agreeable to the Senator to offer his resolution now? A great many Senators who have gone from the Chamber have left word that they did not want to vote to-night on the amendment I have offered. I do not want to take any advantage of the absence of any Senator. Perhaps we would not reach a vote on the amendment to-night, anyway, but I am willing, if the Senator can get unanimous consent, that he may offer his resolution to-night, and I will let my amendment go over until to-morrow.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I would prefer not to do that, because I have not prepared the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I am sure that a number of Senators who are now absent had no warning that this proposal of the Senator from Nebraska would be brought up to-night, and I think it would perhaps be unfair to them to have a vote on the amendment to-night. Can we not go on with the copper amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. As far as I am personally concerned, I am perfectly willing that my amendment should go over, but I did have an understanding with at least a dozen Senators whom I told I intended to offer this amendment as soon as we voted on the lumber schedule. I suppose some Senators who are absent thought perhaps my amendment would not be offered until later. I am willing to go on with my remarks to-night, and at the conclusion of what I have to say, which will not be very long, have the amendment put over, or I am willing to have it go over now.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to ask the Senator from Michigan whether he is ready to go on with the copper amendment?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like very much to proceed with the copper amendment at the present time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am somewhat at a loss to know what to do. There are some Senators who want to go ahead first with the amendment I have offered. I understand a dozen Senators who are not in the Chamber at the present time want to be here when we vote on this amendment. May I ask the Senator from Utah whether we are to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; we have a unanimous-consent agreement to that effect.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose we should go ahead with the copper amendment and not finish the consideration of it to-night. Would the Senator from Michigan be willing that we should then lay it aside and at 11 o'clock to-morrow take up the amendment I have offered?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I would like to ask unanimous consent that the copper amendment be submitted to the Senate without debate and voted upon. If that were done, I think there would be no difficulty, from my point of view, in suspending the session until to-morrow after that.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, if we should vote on the amendment immediately, as the Senator suggests, we would probably go on with something else.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I would include in my unanimous-consent request that after the vote was taken the Senate take a recess.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if that consent were asked, I should, at the conclusion of the vote, move an executive session, so that there would be no more legislative business this evening.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, Mr. President, I will temporarily withdraw the amendment I have offered, with the understanding that I will be allowed to offer it the first thing when the Senate convenes to-morrow morning.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask that the committee amendment relating to copper be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 244, after line 9, the committee proposes to insert:

(7) Copper-bearing ores and concentrates and articles provided for in paragraphs 316, 380, 381, 387, 1620, 1634, 1657, 1658, or 1659 of the tariff act of 1930, 4 cents per pound on the copper contained therein: Provided, That no tax under this paragraph shall be imposed on copper in any of the foregoing which is lost in metallurgical processes. All articles dutiable under the tariff act of 1930, not provided for heretofore in this paragraph, in which copper (including copper in alloys) is the component material of chief value, 3 cents per pound. All articles dutiable under the tariff act of 1930, not provided for heretofore in this paragraph, containing 4 per cent or more of copper by weight, 3 per cent ad valorem or three-fourths of 1 cent per pound, whichever is the lower. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles. The Secretary is authorized to prescribe all necessary regulations for the enforcement of the provisions of this paragraph.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, in the interest of expedition, and in view of the fact that this amendment has been fully discussed by the Finance Committee and its compensatory structure has been technically approved by the experts of the Tariff Commission, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be submitted to immediate vote of the Senate without debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. TYDINGS. I object.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall be very glad to proceed briefly to present the case for copper.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator from Michigan for his courtesy.

Mr. President, there has been placed on the desk of each Senator to-day an amendment which I have offered of a revenue-producing nature which, in the opinion of those most conservatively looking at the question, will yield a revenue of about $375,000,000 per annum in lieu of several other taxes proposed to be offered beginning on page 246. I do not desire to take time to argue for the amendment at the present time, but merely to state, in response to numerous questions which have been submitted to me by various Senators, that I propose to adopt the amendment as soon as——

Mr. BORAH. The Senator means he proposes to offer it?

Mr. BINGHAM. I shall adopt it, but I shall also offer it. I thank the Senator. I propose to offer the amendment as soon as we conclude the discussion of the tariff amendments and as soon as we reach the section on automobiles, on page 246.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator stated he would do so as soon as we complete the tariff items. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has signified his desire, and there is a tacit understanding that he shall have the opportunity to offer the debenture amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I understood he was to offer it as soon as we finish with the copper item. There is still another tariff item, the tariff on rubber. I do not intend to interfere with the proposal of the Senator from Nebraska, but merely am taking advantage of the situation which he has created for the amendment in which he is interested to state that I desire to offer an amendment in regard to a real revenue-producing measure which will help to balance the Budget and which will help to restore economic prosperity, and this as soon as we succeed in finishing the rubber item.

Mr. BORAH. I think it is appropriate that it shall follow rubber. [Laughter.]

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, let me approach the question of expedition from another angle. Instead of asking unanimous consent, which I can readily understand might be offensive in a situation of this sort, let me ask for the yeas and nays upon the pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I should like to have inserted in the RECORD the views of the minority in objection to this item, together with some statistics and a statement of overproduction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The extract from the minority report is as follows:

COPPER

There is no gainsaying the present distress of the American copper industry in the United States. Copper is now selling in New York at around 6 cents per pound. This compares with an average price for the past 30 years (excluding the war years) of 14.8 cents. American copper mines are said to have a potential capacity of 1,318,000 short tons per annum. In 1931 the United States market absorbed roundly 454,500 tons of primary copper and present consumption is lower still, perhaps not in excess of 25 per cent of our producing capacity. Present stocks of copper above ground are said to represent one year's supply for the entire world at present rate of consumption, and the United States alone owns 71 per cent of this stock. Foreign production of copper far outruns foreign consumption. The surplus of foreign copper is displacing domestic copper in our domestic market. What is true of many other commodities applies to copper. The world is suffering from a huge surplus of copper.

The question at issue is whether the erection of a tariff wall against foreign copper will in the long run benefit the country. On that question testimony of opposing copper groups before the Finance Committee was in sharp disagreement.

The proponents of a copper tariff sought a rate of 5 cents per pound and said that they anticipated its effect would be to stabilize the price of American copper in the American market at around 11 cents per pound.

The bill as reported carries a copper tariff at the rate of 4 cents per pound. The contention that, despite such a duty, foreign copper will still be dumped in this market and pay a duty and hence the Government will derive a tariff revenue from the copper duty is in our judgment unconvincing. We incline to the view that the proposed duty would exclude foreign copper and hence be of no consequence so far as revenue is concerned. On the question of the benefit of the proposed duty to the American copper industry and to the country we are inclined to subscribe to the views presented by those representatives of the industry who oppose the duty and who contend that it will do more harm than good. In any event, we submit that the present revenue bill is not the time and place for Congress to deal with the complicated and world-embracing issues which are raised by the question of removing copper from the free list, where it has remained since 1894, and granting compensatory duties to the large number of manufactured products that contain copper.

The other matter referred to by Senator WALSH of Massachusetts is as follows:

OVERPRODUCTION OF COPPER

Couple these world surpluses of copper production with the general depressed business condition in this country and the world, and the principal causes of the deplorable distress in the American copper industry are reached. The copper industry is suffering from the universal ailment of the past few years—overproduction, caused by underconsumption, due to the general depression in all countries.

Here is what has happened to the market for copper in the United States. In 1929 the United States consumed 889,293 tons of copper, the most ever used by this country in a single year. In 1930 we consumed 632,508 tons, a decrease of nearly 28 per cent. In 1931 we consumed 454,000 tons, just slightly more than one-half of what this country consumed in 1929. According to the best information available, domestic consumption for the current year will amount to approximately 330,000 tons, or about 30 per cent of our consumption in 1929.

The steady increase of domestic copper stocks reveals the extent of overproduction in this country since 1928. On January 1, 1929, copper stocks amounted to 268,500 tons; on January 1, 1930, they were 403,000; on January 1, 1931, 532,500 tons were in stock; and on January 1, 1932, 608,500 tons were in stock. In four years domestic copper stocks have much more than doubled. Such surpluses have usually caused a rapid decline in the market price for the commodity.

Copper prices declined rapidly as the volume of copper stocks grew. From an average of 18.1 cents per pound in 1929 the price of copper has dropped to the record low of 5.8 cents per pound in March of 1932. Despite this rapid drop in the price of copper, other metals have suffered a comparable price decline, as shown by the following chart:

Average cents per pound or ounce

	Copper, free	Lead, dutiable	Zinc, dutiable	Tin, free	Silver, free
1929	18.1	6.8	6.8	45.2	53.0
1930	13.0	5.5	4.6	31.7	38.2
1931	8.1	4.2	3.6	24.5	28.7
1932	5.8	3.2	2.8	21.9	29.8

It should also be emphasized that other metal industries have been compelled to curtail their production as drastically as has the American copper industry. The January production of copper was 32.2 per cent of the average 1929 rate, steel production in the same month was 32.3 per cent of the 1929 average, while January production of pig iron was only 27.6 per cent of the monthly average of 1929. The copper industry is but one of the metal industries suffering in this tragic depression.

The 4 cents per pound duty proposed is greatly in excess of the differences in production costs between foreign and domestic copper. As with the oil, coal, and lumber duties carried in this hybrid revenue bill, the copper duty is an embargo. It will raise no revenue and therefore is in no wise germane to a tax bill.

The actual difference between foreign and domestic costs of production amounts to "$1.42 per pound when depletion of ore and interest on investment are taken into consideration, and 0.49 cent per pound when these two items are considered."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ASHURST responded in the affirmative.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. COPELAND. Several Senators are here who do not know what the vote is upon. Will the Chair state the question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the clerk repeat the amendment again.

The Chief Clerk again reported the pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will continue the roll call.

The Chief Clerk resumed the roll call.

Mr. BINGHAM (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. If he were present, he would vote "nay," and if I were permitted to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. BROOKHART (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. If he were present, he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. BULOW (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote with reference to my pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], I withhold my vote.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. If he were present, he would vote "yea." If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. CAREY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY]. If he were present, he would vote "nay," and if I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. I understand that if present he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. HATFIELD (when his name was called). Repeating my former announcement as to my pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON] and its transfer to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and vote "yea." If the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. NORBECK (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and therefore withhold my vote. If that Senator were present, he would vote "yea." If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). On this vote I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. If he were present, he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COPELAND. My colleague the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is necessarily absent. He is paired on this vote with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON], who, if present, would vote "yea." If permitted to vote, my colleague [Mr. WAGNER] would vote "nay."

Mr. WHEELER. My colleague the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, am I recorded as voting in the negative?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is so recorded.

Mr. HARRISON. For the purpose of moving a reconsideration I change my vote from "nay" to "yea."

Mr. BULOW. I desire to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is necessarily detained from the Senate, delivering an address on national relief measures over a nation-wide radio hook-up.

Mr. BRATTON (after voting in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] and let my vote stand.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

I also wish to announce that the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], and the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON] are necessarily out of the city.

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 25, as follows:

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ASHURST. Did the Senator from Mississippi move to reconsider the vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi entered the motion.

Mr. ASHURST. I move to lay the motion on the table, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President I have not made the motion yet. I am merely serving notice that I shall make it in order that I may come within the rule.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received see the end of Senate proceedings.)

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. HASTINGS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of G. Fred Flanders, of Georgia, to be United States marshal, southern district of Georgia, to succeed George B. McLeod, term expired.

Mr. SCHALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Anthony Savage, of Washington, to be United States attorney, western district of Washington.

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably sundry nominations of postmasters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar is in order.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of T. V. O'Connor, of New York, to be a member of the Shipping Board for a term of six years from June 9, 1932.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] has asked that this nomination go over. In view of his illness I have no objection to his request. I have no desire to press the matter if there is not undue delay.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nomination will go over.

THE JUDICIARY—B. B. MONTGOMERY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of B. B. Montgomery to be United States marshal northern district of Mississippi.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, at the last executive session I asked that this nomination go over. Before it is confirmed or rejected I desire to make a short statement in connection with it. I do not know whether it is desirable to do it at this time or to permit the nomination to go over until the next executive session.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I had very much hoped that this matter might be settled. The nominee is a Republican who has been nominated to fill an office in my State. The nomination has been pending in the committee for some time, and, of course, in view of the consideration of the pending tax bill we may not have another executive session for some time. Will not the Senator from Delaware make his statement to-night and let us take action on the nomination?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I was appointed chairman of the subcommittee to consider this nomination, which has been before the Senate for a considerable time. The charge made on which the objection to this nominee is based is that he has made some very disrespectful remarks relative to the colored people of the State of Mississippi. The charge was of sufficient seriousness for the committee to believe that if it could be established that the statement was true it would be sufficient reason for rejecting the nomination.

There were some half-dozen affidavits submitted by various persons who testified in those affidavits that such a statement had been made by Mr. Montgomery. Montgomery, on the other hand, very positively denied making any such statement. All the evidence is that he is a thoroughly competent man for the position, and no objection was made to him except upon this one point. I think the paper evidence before the committee would show that he did make the statement; he insists that he did not; and, of course, there is no definite way to determine whether he did or did not make it.

The colored people of Mississippi sent statements to the colored people's organizations all over the country to the effect that Mr. Montgomery had made the remarks attributed to him. He undoubtedly has created the impression among the colored people all over the country that he had made disrespectful remarks relative to the colored women of the State of Mississippi.

In my judgment, in view of the whole condition of the record, in view of the fact that the colored people of the country believe the statement to be true, whether it be or not, it was not desirable for the Senate to confirm the nominee.

I do not propose to make any extended remarks with respect to the nomination. I merely want to be recorded as against its confirmation.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I join in the request that this nomination go over until the next executive session, and I renew that request. It is not my desire to-night to discuss the merits of the controversial question, namely, whether this nominee did or did not utter the words imputed to him. I think we can save time if the request be granted. I should certainly not ask for any further consideration than that the nomination lie over until to-morrow evening if the Senate please.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I can express myself in a few words with certain data before me which I have not now, not knowing that we would have an executive session this evening. That is the only reason why I make the request. I do not make it for the purpose of indefinite delay at all.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, of course if the Senator wants the nomination to go over and objects to its consideration, I shall not insist upon its being considered. The Senator from Delaware, however, has made a very fair statement of the facts, and I am sure the Senator from California agrees that the issue stated by the Senator from Delaware is that which is before the Senate.

I have known this appointee for some time; he is a Republican and I never mess in Republican politics. I think that some of the colored population believe that perhaps the nominee did make the statement attributed to him, but I am sure they are mistaken, because this man is an upright citizen of the State, and I am sure would make a good officer or I would not be for his confirmation. I had hoped, in view of the fact that we are discussing the tax bill which may take some time, and as this nomination has been before the committee for quite a while, that the Senator, in the bigness of his heart, would permit the Senate to take action on the nomination now and not prolong it, because the nominee ought to be in the office if we are going to confirm him. I hope the Senator will not ask for delay, but will let us take action on the nomination.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, let me repeat what I just stated. Of course, I did not know that we would have an executive session this evening, and I have not the data before me. I repeat that I would be very willing to have an executive session to-morrow, and I shall take but a few moments to lay the facts as I understand them before the Senate. I do not seek, of course, indefinite delay.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator if more facts came to the attention of the committee than those the Senator from Delaware has stated? As I understood, the statement alleged to have been uttered by Mr. Montgomery was brought to the attention of the committee and was denied. I think the Senator knows well that my colleague and I would not want the appointee to be marshal if the facts alleged were true. If there were anything against the nominee, certainly we would be among the first to object.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not wish to delay the confirmation of the nomination. I have expressed my wish.

Mr. HARRISON. If it is a wish of the Senator that the nomination go over, I shall not insist on its being considered. I am only trying to expedite the consideration of the tax bill and at the same time to accord prompt consideration to a matter that is of some importance and which has been delayed for some time in the committee.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If I may do so, I ask unanimous consent, in order to speed the matter, that when we take a recess to-morrow evening, as in legislative session, we hold an executive session.

Mr. HARRISON. In the meanwhile, of course, if the Senator thinks of it no further, we can act accordingly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Precisely. In any event, I will not take more than a few moments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to passing the nomination over? The Chair hears none.

The clerk will report the next nomination on the calendar.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION

The Chief Clerk announced the nomination of Col. Harley B. Ferguson, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, to be member and president of the Mississippi River Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. ODDIE. I ask unanimous consent that the list of nominations of postmasters may be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

NAVY

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry officers of the Navy.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that all naval nominations may be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the naval nominations are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

BALANCING THE BUDGET—REPLY TO WILMINGTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Chamber of Commerce of the City of Wilmington, Del., recently adopted a resolution couched in three paragraphs. In one paragraph it is stated that in their belief, speaking to the membership of the Chamber, the Budget should be balanced without resort to taxation. If it can not be thus balanced, then taxation would be advisable.

The senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] has answered the resolution, item by item, in a communication to the editors of the Evening Journal, the Morning News, and Every Evening. I think every Senator would like to have the information contained in the letter prepared by the Senator from Delaware. It is in succinct form, indicates what the charges on the Treasury are, both for 1931 and for the present year, and then comments on each item. I ask unanimous consent that the letter may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. I did not understand the full import of his statement. Does the statement show that the Budget may be balanced without the imposition of taxes?

Mr. FESS. It certainly does not. The opposition to the imposition of additional taxes is so general and I think misinformation throughout the country also is so general that I believe the succinct answer the Senator from Delaware has made affords very valuable information for us all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio to print in the RECORD the communication referred to by him?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARCH 30, 1932.

To the EDITORS EVENING JOURNAL, MORNING NEWS, EVERY EVENING.

MY DEAR SIRS: I have prepared a statement upon a matter in which I believe all of the citizens of Delaware are very much interested. It refers to the difficult problem of balancing the Federal Budget. I have endeavored to put the facts and the figures in as concise form as possible and I should be very grateful to you if you would publish the following statement in full.

A letter from the Chamber of Commerce of Wilmington, under date of March 25, calls my attention to the fact that at a special meeting of the board of directors held on that date the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Whereas this body, on March 10, 1932, by its vote on referendum No. 60 of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, placed itself on record in favor of the Federal Government balancing its Budget—first, through a reduction of expenditures, then, if this were not possible, by assessment of taxes; and

"Whereas a further study of this question has convinced us that the balancing of the Budget can be accomplished by the reduction of Federal expenditures: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we go on record in favor of balancing the Budget by a reduction of Federal expenditures before resorting to any increase in existing taxes or imposition of new taxes."

In this morning's mail I received numerous letters from business people in Wilmington calling my attention to this resolution and urging me to do what I could to accomplish the result mentioned therein. This resolution, in effect, states that the chamber of commerce has given the matter careful study and has reached the conclusion, if I understand the resolution, that it is possible to balance the Budget by cutting Federal expenditures and that it will not, therefore, be necessary to increase taxes if the reductions are made.

Such a statement as this by the chamber of commerce makes it imperative, from my point of view, to point out the impossible task which such a resolution imposes upon Congress.

I urge all persons who are interested in this subject to study the following figures with the greatest care:

Fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931, and ending June 30, 1932

Item:
A. Statutory debt retirement	$412,000,000
B. Interest on public debt	605,000,000
C. Annual payments for aid to veterans	989,500,000
D. Expense of national defense	721,400,000
E. Public buildings and public works	528,200,000
F. Administrative and other expenses	1,226,000,000
Total	4,482,100,000
Estimated income	2,243,000,000
Deficit	2,239,100,000

Estimated figures for fiscal year beginning July 1, 1932, and ending June 30, 1933

Item:
A. Statutory debt retirement	$496,800,000
B. Interest on public debt	640,000,000
C. Annual payments for aid to veterans	983,200,000
D. Expense of national defense	694,800,000
E. Public buildings and public works	392,900,000
F. Administrative and other expenses	905,200,000
Total	4,112,900,000
Estimated income	2,374,900,000
Deficit	1,738,000,000

In endeavoring to balance the Budget we must look at the above figures and see whether or not it can be done. I desire to discuss them in the order in which I have stated them.

ITEM A. STATUTORY DEBT RETIREMENT

It will be observed that the statutory requirement for debt retirement has been increased by the sum of $84,800,000. This item is not a particularly important item, in view of the fact that we are borrowing money to maintain the sinking fund. It is considered important, however, by most persons to continue to make the sinking fund payments.

ITEM B. INTEREST ON PUBLIC DEBT

It will be observed that this item has been increased by $35,000,000. Nobody, of course, intends to suggest that there can be any reduction in this item.

ITEM C. ANNUAL PAYMENTS FOR AID TO VETERANS

This item has been reduced in the next fiscal year over that of the present year by the sum of $6,300,000. These annual payments for the aid of the veterans grow out of a series of laws that have been passed since the World War for the aid of the veterans. I think it may be safe to say that by far the greatest portion of it is for the aid of disabled veterans. Personally, I have not been as liberal with the World War veterans as many of my friends think I ought to have been. My objection to appropriating Federal money to aid the veteran has been confined to the physically able veteran. I think none of us can afford to neglect the disabled veteran, and therefore, from my point of view, I do not see how this item could be greatly reduced.

ITEM D. EXPENSE OF NATIONAL DEFENSE

This item has been reduced in the next fiscal year over the present fiscal year by $26,600,000. There is, of course, a very serious difference of opinion as to whether this item could be further reduced. There are many people in the country who are inclined to believe that it might be reduced to a nominal sum. Others believe that to undertake to economize on this item is false economy. There are many persons also who believe that the item ought to be greatly increased. I am satisfied that the President and the departments constituting the national defense have reduced it as much as it is reasonably possible to reduce it with safety to the country.

It will be observed, therefore, that in the present fiscal year these items, consisting of items A, B, C, and D, which seem to me can not be reduced, amount to $2,727,900,000 and the same items for the next fiscal year amount to $2,814,800,000. This shows an increase in the permanent Government expenses of $86,900,000.

ITEM E. PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND PUBLIC WORKS

The next fiscal year in this item over the present fiscal year shows a decrease of $135,300,000. This item includes appropriations for river and harbor improvements and $160,000,000 appropriated for aid to the different States in building roads.

There has been much controversy, of course, about the Government's attitude with respect to expending large sums for the purpose of building public buildings and public works; the contention made being that this is one of the ways in which the Government could assist in the matter of unemployment. Just how much reduction could be made here may very well be questioned.

ITEM F. ADMINISTRATIVE AND OTHER EXPENSES

The estimate for the coming fiscal year as compared with the present fiscal year shows a reduction of $320,800,000. This item includes $195,000,000 deficit due to loss sustained by the Government in the Post Office Department. It also includes $90,700,000 that was returned to the taxpayers as an overpayment in taxes. Nobody will contend that this $90,700,000 should not be returned and when it comes to considering the reduction in expense this item should be classed as a permanent item upon which no reduction can be made.

Let us take items E and F for the coming fiscal year, amounting to $1,208,100,000, deduct from that $90,700,000 that it is estimated will be required to refund overpaid taxes, and you have left $1,107,400,000.

Admitting, as I contend every reasonable person must admit, that it is from this item alone that savings can be made and remembering also that the estimated deficit for the coming fiscal year will be $1,738,000,000, then I ask the question how the chamber of commerce or anybody else can argue that it is possible for the Congress to balance this Budget without raising additional revenue? In other words, if you take as permanent items A, B, C, and D and admit that the savings can be made only in items E and F and deduct the amount that is necessary to refund overpaid taxes you are short $630,600,000, if you eliminate the entire expenses of items E. and F. In other words, if you stopped all public buildings and all public works and cut out every administrative expense in the entire country, you would still be short $630,000,000.

I merely ask the question, therefore, how any reasonable person can expect Congress to balance the Budget without finding some new way to raise revenue? If anybody has any suggestions to make along this line, I should be delighted to hear from him.

I do not want to be understood as not being in sympathy with a reduction in the Federal expenses, nor do I want to be understood as saying that it is not possible to do anything, but I do say emphatically that you can neither balance nor approach a balance by cutting Federal expenses alone.

INCREASE IN PUBLIC DEBT

In connection with the above statement it might be well to call attention to the fact that for the fiscal years 1931 and 1932 the public debt has been increased by $3,069,000,000.

DANIEL O. HASTINGS.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess, the recess being in conformity with the order heretofore entered, until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 9 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in accordance with the order previously entered, took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 24, 1932, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 23 (legislative day of May 9), 1932

MEMBER OF THE FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

Marcel Garsaud, of Louisiana, to be a member of the Federal Power Commission for the term expiring June 22, 1937 (reappointment).

MEMBER OF THE FEDERAL FARM BOARD

C. B. Denman, of Missouri, to be a member of the Federal Farm Board for a term of six years from June 15, 1932 (reappointment).

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS

George D. Hubbard, of Seattle, Wash., to be collector of customs for customs-collection district No. 30, with headquarters at Seattle, Wash. (reappointment).

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MAY 23, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou loving, condescending God, we ask Thee to hear and accept our petition. Through Thy gracious providence Thou hast again smiled tenderly and gently upon us; we, therefore, offer Thee our tributes of praise. We seek Thy presence; do Thou enter our hearts as a rich grace, as a sweet benediction, and as a fadeless blossom. O make them the seat of Thy sovereignty. Show us the necessity of the divine purpose, and lighten up the way before us. Renewed, freshened, and cheered, let us turn again to our particular tasks. Springing from real, vital enthusiasm for our country, let this day mean success over all obstacles. May it abide as a living witness to the industrious and faithful labors of this Congress. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 83]

Abernethy	Corning	Johnson, Ill.	Peavey
Allgood	Coyle	Kendall	Rayburn
Boehne	De Priest	Kerr	Seiberling
Bohn	Drane	Lamneck	Shallenberger
Boylan	Fiesinger	Lea	Sparks
Brand, Ohio	Foss	Lewis	Stokes
Cannon	Gibson	Mitchell	Strong, Kans.
Celler	Goodwin	Milligan	Tucker
Chapman	Hare	Murphy	Welsh, Pa.
Chase	Haugen	Oliver, Ala.	Yon
Collier	Hornor	Owen

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and eighty-nine Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

THE JOURNAL

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, May 21, 1932, was read and approved.

BEER TAX

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up motion No. 3 on the Calendar of Motions to Discharge Committees and move to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10017) to provide additional revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLANTON. I desire to make a point of order when the Clerk reports it, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10017 and the gentleman from Texas makes a point of order. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion to discharge the committee is in contravention of the House rule with respect to petitions to discharge a committee, and is also in contravention of a ruling made by the Speaker at the time the rule was under discussion and adopted, that no two bills embracing similar subjects shall be submitted to the House of Representatives at the same session of Congress under the discharge motion.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, this is a question which involves the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and we have already had that question up on a motion to discharge when the so-called Beck-Linthicum resolution was called up and passed upon adversely by the House, and that this is the second attempt to bring the same subject, involving the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, before the House at the same session, and that this being in contravention of the rule, with regard to the Speaker's ruling on the rule, it is out of order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, to the point of order permit me to say: With this question in mind when the rule was adopted, following what I said in the caucus when the gentleman from Georgia, who introduced this rule, took the floor, I asked him a question—or he anticipated my asking the question—and he answered it, that a motion to discharge the committee from the consideration of the repeal or modification of the eighteenth amendment in his opinion was not substantially identical with a motion to discharge the committee from the consideration of an amendment to the Volstead Act, one being a constitutional question and the other being a mere matter of legislation.

The language in the rule is this:

Relating in substance to or dealing with the same subject matter.

For years, at different sessions of Congress, we have passed legislation dealing with amendments to the Volstead Act. That is quite different from an attempt to repeal or modify an amendment to the Constitution. I believe at the time of the adoption of the rule the Speaker had something to say about it. I did not anticipate this question was coming up, because I thought it was well settled.

Mr. Speaker, I submit there is no point in the point of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, the question raised by the gentleman from Texas might have been raised if this motion to discharge had been pending on the calendar when the House voted on the previous motion to discharge.

Let me call the attention of the Speaker to the language of the proviso. In the first instance, the limitation is to the same bill. This, of course, concededly is not the same bill. The first was a resolution submitting to the several States a constitutional objection repealing the eighteenth amendment, and the bill now involved is a revenue measure, incidentally permitting the sale of beer. The fact that the resolution and the present bill were referred to two different committees would indicate different subject matters. Now, when we come to bills "substantially" the same, the limitation in the rule is applicable only when there is another motion to discharge pending and on the calendar.

The rule says:

That if before any one motion to discharge a committee has been acted upon by the House there are on the Calendar of Motions to Discharge Committees other motions to discharge committees from the consideration of bills or resolutions substantially the same, relating in substance to or dealing with the same subject matter, after the House shall have acted on one motion to discharge, the remaining said motions shall be stricken from the Calendar on Motions to Discharge Committees and not acted on during the remainder of that session of Congress.

Therefore it will be seen that the limitation is where there are two or more motions to discharge on the calendar. The other limitation refers to motions to discharge the same bill. For instance, if after the House had voted down the motion to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from further consideration of a constitutional amendment to repeal the eighteenth amendment, we were now called upon to again vote on a proposed constitutional amendment to repeal the eighteenth amendment, differently worded, then the point of order raised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] would be in order; but the limitation as to similar subjects is where you have two motions to discharge on the calendar at the same time, and, therefore, the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard on the point of order a moment, if the Chair will permit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from New York, Mr. Speaker, is too good a lawyer not to realize that if this motion had any chance to pass—and it does not have any—or if it could pass, this very question would be brought before the Supreme Court on a question of constitutionality, in that it contravenes the provisions of the eighteenth amendment which provides that there shall not be manufactured or sold in the United States any intoxicating beverages.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing his point of order.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON (continuing). To this extent, the gentleman from New York and other lawyers here know that the constitutionality of the provisions of the measure is involved, and there has been before us already one other discharge petition relating to the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the gentleman from Texas is not speaking to his point of order.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the gentleman from Texas is not discussing the question before the House.

Mr. BLANTON. I am discussing my point of order, that under the rules only one such discharge petition is in order, and the House has already acted on the Beck-Linthicum petition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. BLANTON. If the Chair is ready to rule, I shall not take further time of the House.

The SPEAKER. This identical question was brought up in the Democratic caucus at the time it passed on the amendments to the rules prepared by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. This same question was asked the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], and this particular case was used as an illustration in the Democratic caucus. When the House was considering the adoption of this particular rule the gentleman from Georgia again illustrated the situation by this identical case, and, according to the Chair's recollection, the gentleman said that in case a motion to discharge a committee from considering a bill authorizing 2 per cent beer was voted down, there could not be another motion for the purpose of voting on the question of 4 per cent beer, or even 1 per cent beer; but it was distinctly discussed and understood at the time that the question to amend the Constitution was one question and that the question of legalizing beer was another. The House has passed on the question of a constitutional amendment but has not passed on the question of whether or not the House would provide a different definition of legalized beer.

The Chair thinks it is clearly within the rule as intended by the gentleman from Georgia and as understood by the House; and unless the gentleman from Georgia gives the Chair the benefit of an opinion to the contrary, the Chair thinks there is no doubt but that he should overrule the point of order. The Chair would like to know if the Chair has properly interpreted the thought of the gentleman from Georgia at the time the gentleman presented this rule.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, for years I have advocated rules putting it within the power of a majority of the House to work its will, and as the author of this discharge rule I determined to make it an effective rule. The rule is effective, and in seeking to stop any filibuster there is a provision in the rule that after the House has voted on one substantive subject matter other motions to discharge can not be made dealing with that same subject matter. In my discussion of the matter on the floor of the House and in the caucus I frankly and honestly said I thought there was a difference between a motion to discharge a committee dealing with a constitutional amendment and a motion of the kind now before the House. I said that in my judgment it would be in order under the rule to have one vote to discharge on each of these distinctive, substantive matters, and when a vote had been had on each one of them no other vote during that session of Congress can be had. I think the rule means exactly this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] is recognized for 10 minutes and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] for 10 minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 10017 may be read.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object. We know what it is.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield one and a half minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK].

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, when the rule under which we are now acting was under consideration at the beginning of this session, I ventured to call to the attention of my friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] the inadequacy of the rule for any careful debate or consideration of any motion that under that rule might be brought before the House. The two experiences we have had demonstrate the soundness of this objection.

It is preposterous that the repeal of a Constitutional amendment, or this important bill to modify the Volstead law and gain at least $400,000,000 for the Treasury, should only be permitted 20 minutes of debate, and the country will so regard it. I only have time in my minute and a quarter, or whatever time I shall have, to say that what we are now proposing in this resolution does not involve any nullification of the Constitution, as my friend from Texas has argued. The first section of the eighteenth amendment was the statement of a great objective. The amendment was not self-enforcing. The method of that enforcement was committed by the amendment itself to the sound political discretion of Congress. Therefore——

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I object for the present.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, the Ways and Means Committee is not sensitive in the slightest as to the way it performs its public duty. The Ways and Means Committee is actuated with but one purpose, to report legislation or to kill legislation, according to the judgment of the committee as to what is best for the country. We are not objecting in the slightest to this motion to discharge the committee from the further consideration of this bill, the beer bill.

It was foolish for the committee to have hearings on this bill when the committee was working every day on matters of the highest public importance, because it knew the sentiment of the committee as to this legislation, it knew the sentiment of the House as to this legislation, and knew that a vote on it now was nothing but a moot question for the purpose of letting the Members go on record, and as far as that is concerned I think our constituents have the right to know how we stand on this question.

Now, what are the facts concerning the bill before the committee? When we were considering the tax bill my friend from New York [Mr. CULLEN] offered an amendment levying a tax on beer. The committee voted on it, and, if my recollection is correct, there were 7 votes in the affirmative and 16 in the negative. That expressed the view of the Ways and Means Committee on this problem.

When the tax bill was up for consideration in the House we had an extensive debate on it. This very question was debated—not for 20 minutes but for several hours—and, of course, in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union there is no record vote. After discussion in the committee, we had a vote by tellers. That occurred on the 25th of March, and those voting in favor of taxing beer totaled 132 and those voting against it totaled 216. So, I repeat, gentlemen, that so far as this motion is concerned it is simply a moot question. Everybody in the House knows just as well now as they will know at the conclusion of the roll call as to what the result is going to be.

Now, my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] referred to the limited time allowed for debate, and when I was advocating the discharge rule, he called attention to it, and asked that the time be extended. I could not see it that way. This is a drastic motion. It is only expected to be used in dealing with recalcitrant committees, or committees that will not report legislation. It simply can not be used unless it gets 145 Members of the House desiring to go on record to see if they will take it away from the committee. Twenty minutes gives everybody in the House an opportunity to know whether they desire to discharge the committee and bring up the bill for consideration.

If you can get 145 men to sign a motion to discharge, everybody knows in substance what the bill is, and if the majority of the House desires to consider the legislation, and vote to discharge the committee, then the bill comes up in the House for consideration under the rules of the House, with ad libitum debate. If the House wants to debate it, the House can debate it as long as it pleases. It is open to amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the gentleman from Georgia will yield, the Senate has voted 3 to 1 against this proposition.

Mr. CRISP. The Ways and Means Committee, by a majority of that committee, in my judgment, will not bring in a bill proposing to levy a tax on beer, as long as the eighteenth amendment is in the Constitution, and as long as the Volstead Act is on the statute books——

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. No; I have only three minutes. The Ways and Means Committee has no jurisdiction of the Volstead Act.

That is before the Committee on the Judiciary; and if that committee reports a bill repealing the Volstead Act and the Congress passes it, that will be time enough for the Committee on Ways and Means to consider the question of whether it will levy a tax on beer. Some very able lawyers contend that 2.75 per cent beer would violate the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution and some declare not. The question as to whether or not beer if drunk to excess will produce intoxication is a judicial question. The courts would have to determine that. Oh, I grant you that the Volstead Act says that more than one-half of 1 per cent violates it. Maybe you could have a higher per cent, but the question of whether 2.75 per cent violates the Constitution is a serious one, and the Ways and Means Committee, speaking for a majority of them, will not report this bill favorably. If a majority of the House desires to consider it, their remedy is to vote to-day to discharge the committee and take it away from that committee and then consider it in the House under just as liberal terms as to debate and amendment as it sees fit.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, the lady from New York [Mrs. PRATT] a few moments ago endeavored, unsuccessfully, to have inserted in the RECORD a copy of a letter from President Hoover, which is being carried this morning in practically every big newspaper in the United States and in which the President appeals more or less directly to Congress for constructive legislation which will be of benefit to the Federal Treasury and at the same time assist in balancing the Budget. He opposes appropriations which will not in themselves produce revenue in return. He opposes the $5,000,000,000 Federal-building construction bond issue, because he says it will place an added burden upon the taxpayer, who is already gasping for relief. The so-called beer bill about to be voted upon is the only measure now pending before Congress, which will produce $500,000,000 in new revenues, it will tax an important industry into active business, it will provide large additional revenues for the railroads, it will stimulate trade in several hundred specific directions, it will promote an outlet for millions of bushels of grain for which the American farmer is now seeking a customer, it will provide immediate employment to several hundred thousand people and last, but not least, Mr. Speaker, it will make those untold millions of American citizens, who are ready and willing to pay for a good glass of beer, happy. I simply can not understand the mental attitude of a man who will deliberately refuse to accept this tremendous revenue at a time when his Government is increasing income taxes, inheritance and gift taxes, to say nothing of a lot of nuisance taxes now carried in the revenue bill pending before the Senate. I shall vote for a tax on beer.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, we have the opportunity to-day of doing something for the people of our country. This bill, H. R. 10017, comes within the provisions of the Constitution because it provides for 2.75 per cent beer, which is known to be nonintoxicating and therefore within the Constitution. Ample provision is made throughout the bill for the protection of those States which desire to continue dry, and it even goes further and provides for the protection of any political subdivision of any State. It has a particularly good feature in that it proposes to raise a tax of $500,000,000 from people who are willing to pay the tax, and that is a great phenomenon.

You are trying to balance the Budget, and you are placing heavy taxes upon people to do so—people who are already heavily burdened and whose income and profits have been reduced almost to the invisible point. If you enact this bill it will enable Congress to remove all these nuisance taxes, to retain 2-cent postage, and to strike from the list much of the increase on incomes and corporation taxes. If there ever was an opportunity for Congress to do the right thing it is to-day by the passage of this bill. Wherever an election has been held, wherever a referendum has been referred to the people, the people themselves have said that they want the eighteenth amendment repealed and they want the manufacture of beer made possible.

You have prohibition on the books, but you have prohibition, in fact, nowhere in this country. There are to-day thousands of speak-easies spread throughout the land. You have no regulation of the liquor traffic, whereas if you repeal the eighteenth amendment you can devise methods for the control of liquor. You have tried this "noble experiment" for 12 years, have arrested 700,000 people in trying to enforce it, and have convicted 500,000. You have crowded the jails to overflowing and are now busily providing for more jails. You have collected $60,000,000 in fines, and something like $231,000,000 in property have been seized or confiscated. A revenue of $10,984,000,000 has been lost to the Government, and yet the drink bill has aggregated $28,000,000,000. The whole country has been thrown into disorder, immorality established, the criminal class financed and abetted.

We must turn back to the old days. We must grant more liberty to the people. We must again provide the great revenue which we have lost, and the passage of this bill for the legalized manufacture and taxing of beer will do much for the country, will injure no one, will drive out bootleggers, racketeers, and criminals to a most alarming extent, and will place a tax on people who are willing to pay it.

What this country needs is a smile on the faces of the people; and if we can pass this bill we will restore that smile, which in itself will do so much toward prosperity and success. I sincerely trust the Congress will not turn down this great opportunity.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable lip service rendered during the present session of Congress toward balancing the Budget. The motion to discharge the committee and for the House to consider the beer tax bill presents an opportunity of either permitting the Internal Revenue Department of the Government to collect taxes on beer or to continue to permit the racketeers to do it. Now is the time for every Member of the House by his vote to balance the Budget. Either vote for this motion and the bill and balance the Budget or forever after hold your peace. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GRANFIELD].

Mr. GRANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I trust the House will adopt the discharge motion and permit the O'Connor bill to be considered on its merits.

This bill writes into the Volstead Act a sane, sensible, and honest definition of intoxicating beverage, and is a substitute for the present dishonest legal limit of one-half of 1 per cent, which has been aptly characterized as a legislative lie. It will open up a large source of revenue and replenish an impoverished Federal Treasury at a time when the taxpayers of this country are indignantly demanding relief from excessive tax burdens. It will divert millions of dollars into the channels of legitimate business when a stimulant to industry, commerce, and business is indispensable to the welfare of the Nation. It will supply much needed unemployment relief. The country demands straightforward action on this bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of whether or not we will have beer. It is a question of whether or not beer shall be brought into the open, where it can be made to contribute to the revenues of the Government. It is also a question of whether or not the express and known will of a large part of this country shall be heard by this House or suppressed until it becomes explosive.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the adoption of this bill will give immediate employment to at least 200,000 directly and 500,000 indirectly of the vast army of the unemployed and will start the wheels of commerce turning again. It will raise a revenue from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000 annually and aid in balancing the Budget. It will aid in restoring law and order. It will aid the farmer of this country by utilizing millions of bushels of barley, rye, and malt now rotting in the grain elevators. It will increase the acreage of these commodities and reduce that of wheat and corn. It will not only help the railroad companies by increasing freight, but it will help all business. But, above all, it will allay the resentment and discontent.

Since the vote has been taken in the other Chamber many of those voting against this bill have heard in no uncertain terms from their States.

Do not remain deaf to the demands of 72 per cent of the American citizens. Give the people the nourishing beverage they demand. This will aid them to secure needed food. It is not my appeal but the appeal of 90 per cent of the American wage earners. You can not appease them by a referendum, as the prohibitionists and the Republican leaders propose, but by action. Please remember, gentlemen, people demand action and relief.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to that distinguished gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD]. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House in the moment is not whether we shall have thin beer or fat beer. I prefer the fat kind. The question now is whether or not this matter shall be submitted to the House for serious consideration by the representatives of the people who have appealed to the Congress in that behalf. I hope the bill will be taken away from the Committee on Ways and Means, and that the House will have a chance to consider it on its merits.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-quarter minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLEOD].

Mr. MCLEOD. Mr. Speaker, the time has arrived for Members of Congress to start thinking in terms for the good of the Nation and disregard the recommendations and erroneous views of a well-meaning but mistaken minority.

The long-disregarded and pigeonholed prohibition question will no longer brook delay; it has become a mighty issue which transcends party. It has come to pass that the future prosperity and well-being of our country depend in a great measure upon immediate modification of the prohibition law. Legalizing the manufacture and sale of nonintoxicating beer containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight will provide immediate employment for hundreds of thousands. Sixty-five thousand men were employed by breweries alone, but the total engaged in making, handling, and selling their products was over 300,000 persons. Our farms will find a market for 120,000,000 bushels of grain annually. The consumption of sugar will be increased by 64,000,000 pounds a year.

At present, thousands of coal mines are closed and thousands upon thousands of miners destitute. The United States census reports show that the brewing industry annually used approximately 3,000,000 tons of coal, or three and one-half times as much as the packers, six times as much as the printers and publishers, nine times as much as the manufacturers of boots and shoes and twenty-five times as much as the manufacturers of men's clothing.

In addition to these 3,000,000 tons of coal, the breweries annually used a million and a half tons of foodstuffs, and including 9,000,000 tons of their own products, they required railroad and team transportation for thirteen and a half million tons, of which over one-half was hauled by railroads. This requires over 200,000 freight cars during a year and keeps several hundred locomotives in constant operation. The urgent need of our financially embarrassed railroads for this business is too obvious and well known for me to stress. I might also mention that the large portion of this tonnage formerly requiring team transportation would now prove an inestimable boon to the trucking industry.

With estimates placing the total number of unemployed in our country at anywhere from six to ten millions, there is a crying need for the Government to discharge its imperative obligation to provide work for these poverty-stricken and destitute people, who, in many cases, are wholly dependent upon public-welfare agencies for even the barest necessities of life. Every day that goes by sees our unemployed increase in number, while the distress and misery among our people is beyond description. The resources of our relief agencies are already heavily overtaxed, and on every side we begin to hear grave doubts and misgivings voiced as to their ability to cope with the unemployment problem next winter. If we do not face the situation squarely and act without further procrastination, there is every indication that we may expect the most disastrous consequences before the coming winter has drawn to a close.

In the past 12 years prohibition has cost the United States approximately $11,000,000,000 in lost revenue. In addition to this staggering sum, $370,000,000 has been squandered in ineffectual attempts at enforcement. The loss of this vast revenue is shortly to be most forcibly brought home to us. Because of it we will have to pay 3 cents postage on our letters instead of 2 cents; among many other nuisance taxes, we will be taxed on our movie tickets, bank checks, stock transfers, automobiles, and radios. The situation might aptly be described by saying that the United States voluntarily has abandoned the greatest fiscal source of revenue of virtually every country in the world, at tremendous cost, without receiving in return a single one of the moral and social benefits for which the measure was enacted.

Far from having decreased since the advent of prohibition, crime has increased by leaps and bounds to an unparalleled degree. During the period from January, 1920, to July 30, 1931, arrests for violations of the prohibition law reached the startling total of 681,657. This means that the United States Government has been busy incarcerating its citizens at the rate of about a thousand a week ever since the inauguration of prohibition.

The growth and expansion of bootlegging and other criminal activities has been most noticeable in our larger cities, where it has become a matter of the gravest concern. Street warfare between rival gangs, settling their beer-running feuds by machine-gun fire in crowded streets, killing and maiming with cold-blooded indifference the innocent passers-by who happen to be in the line of fire when the shooting begins, has become a matter of frequent occurrence.

Statistics show that before prohibition yearly arrests for drunkenness averaged 8,553; since prohibition this average has increased to 13,166. In 1910 there were 2,909 deaths from alcohol; in 1929 there were 4,339. Does that look like the people were having any difficulty in obtaining intoxicating liquor? It most assuredly does not, but it does indicate a great lowering of quality in the liquor consumed.

To our everlasting shame, we have the obnoxious prohibition law to thank for the corruption and racketeering practices that made it possible for the most notorious gangster of the age to escape the penalty of his numerous crimes and remain at liberty until tripped up by the Federal Government for failure to pay taxes on his unlawfully acquired wealth. We owe it to the fair name of American justice to make such conditions no longer possible.

In a scathing denunciation of the prohibition law, Commissioner Loesch, of the Wickersham Commission, on pages 31 and 149 of the Wickersham report, said:

> In some parts of the country enormous sums of money are derived from the business of illicit beer. The profits from illicit beer are the strength of gangs and corrupt political organizations in many places. Those organizations of murderers and archcriminals can only be destroyed when their bootleg-liquor profits are taken from them. So long as the eighteenth amendment remains in its present rigid form, the Nation, the States, the municipalities, the individual citizen, are helpless to get out of reach of their poisonous breaths and slimy tentacles.

We all have among our friends and acquaintances earnest and sincere individuals, who seem to possess a beclouded faculty of perception. Regardless of the fact that the foundation stones of their castle have crumbled and the edifice has become a mere heap of débris, they refuse to admit the structure no longer stands. Our great American author and essayist, Ralph Waldo Emerson, once said:

> A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen and philosophers and divines. With consistency a great soul has simply nothing to do. He may as well concern himself with his shadow on the wall.

After 12 costly years of attempted enforcement, during which we, to our sorrow, have seen a steady increase in bootlegging, drunkenness, deaths from alcoholism, racketeering, and gang warfare, culminating in our present depression, it can not but help be plain to its past supporters that instead of fulfilling their noble and praiseworthy aims, prohibition has multiplied a thousandfold the very evils they strove by its enactment to suppress, and that the only way out of our present dilemma is immediate modification.

The enactment of the bill which is before this honorable body to-day will, by taxing beer 3 cents a pint, yield an annual revenue to the Federal Government of a full half billion dollars, place a hardship on nobody, and at once relieve industries and private citizens from existing and additional tax burdens. It will be well for us to bear in mind that the disagreeable nuisance taxes now being contemplated will bring in a yield of only two hundred and forty millions. The bill makes impossible the return of the old saloon by limiting the sale of beer to bottles, thereby doing away with the necessity for a bar with its apparatus for drawing the beer from kegs or barrels. No beer may be sold for consumption on the premises or in the building where the sale takes place, except with meals in a regularly established dining room of a hotel or restaurant.

The bill further provides that no ex-convict can obtain a license to sell the beer or keep an ex-convict in his employ. The incorporation of these provisions in the bill removes all logical and valid objections to its passage.

In the midst of the worst economic depression the world has ever known, shall we help prolong the misery and suffering among our people and retard our return to normalcy by clinging to prohibition when it is clearly shown that modification will provide employment to hundreds of thousands, give the vitally needed stimulus to industry, provide a half billion dollars annually in revenue, materially assist in balancing the Budget, make nuisance taxes unnecessary, at one sweep clean up crime in our cities by cutting off at its source the easily obtained wealth which enables gangsters and racketeers to carry on their nefarious activities, when modification will promote true temperance by making available good, wholesome, and nonintoxicating beer to people who now have no choice but to do without entirely or drink the harmful and in many instances poisonous hard liquors supplied in abundance by the thousands of untaxed bootleggers and speak-easies that thrive throughout the entire country?

Let us rather follow the clear and unmistakable path of duty which leads by way of modification to true temperance, law observance, and morality.

Let us rather rid ourselves of this prolific source of crime and corruption, this costly experiment that has proved such a ghastly and ignoble failure, and awake to the fact that the time has long since passed for us passively to submit to the domination of a mistaken and fanatical minority. In closing I most strenuously urge that you, my colleagues, regardless of your views in the past, to-day unite in abolishing this evil that is undermining the very foundations of our Nation. By voting for this beer bill you may rest assured that you have taken the first great step forward in paving the way to our speedy economic recovery.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, the Democratic delegation from New York, under the leadership of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULLEN], will, of course, vote wet. Our party is the wet party in the State of New York. We fought the adoption of the eighteenth amendment, and through all the days of dry terrorism, the Democratic Party in New York has fought for the people and liberalism.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I yield one and one-half minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the great agnostic, Robert Ingersoll, said:

> I believe that from the time alcohol issues from the coiled and poisonous worm in the distillery until it empties into the hell of death, dishonor, and crime it demoralizes everything that touches it from its source to its end.
>
> No one can contemplate the object without prejudice against the liquor crime. All we have to do is to think of the wrecks on either banks of the stream of death, of the suicides, of the insanity, of the poverty, of the ignorance, of the destitution, of the little children tugging at the faded and withered breasts of weeping and despairing mothers, of the wives asking for bread, of the men of genius it has wrecked, and man struggling with imaginary serpents. I believe every thoughtful man is prejudiced against this damned stuff that is called alcohol.
>
> It cuts down youth in its vigor, manhood in its strength, and age in its weakness. It breaks the father's heart, bereaves the doting mother, extinguishes natural affections, erases conjugal love, blots out filial attachments, blights parental hope, and brings down mourning age in sorrow to the grave. Alcohol produces weakness, not strength; sickness, not health; death, not life. It makes wives widows, children orphans, fathers fiends, and all of them paupers and beggars. It feeds rheumatism, nurses gout, invites cholera, imparts pestilence, and embraces consumption.
>
> Alcohol covers the land with idleness, misery, and crime. It fills our jails, almshouses, and asylums. It engenders controversy, fosters quarrel, and cherishes riots. It crowds our penitentiaries and furnishes victims for the scaffold. It is the lifeblood of the gambler, the element of the burglar, the prop of the highwayman, and the support of the midnight incendiary.
>
> It countenances the liar, respects the thief, esteems the blasphemer. It violates obligations, reverences fraud, and honors infamy. It defames benevolence, hates love, scorns virtue, slanders innocence.
>
> Alcohol incites the father to butcher his helpless offspring, helps the husband to massacre his wife, and the children to grind the parricidal ax. It burns up man, consumes women, detests life, curses God, and despises heaven. It suborns witnesses, nurses perjury, defiles the jury box, and stains the judicial ermine. It degrades the citizen, debases the legislature, dishonors the statesman, and disarms the patriot.
> Alcohol brings shame, not honor; terror, not safety; despair, not hope; misery, not happiness—and with the malevolence of a fiend it calmly surveys its frightful desolation and, unsatisfied with havoc, it poisons felicity, kills peace, ruins morals, blights confidence, slays reputations, and wipes out national honor—then curses the world and laughs at its ruin.
> Alcohol does all that and more—it murders the soul. It is the sum of all villainies, the father of all crimes, the mother of abominations, the devil's best friend, and God's worst enemy.

Mr. Speaker, to-day it is sought to bring this alcohol curse back upon the Nation. I am against it. We must defeat it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-quarter minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY].

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, newspapers carried reports to-day that the Anti-Saloon League has indorsed Franklin D. Roosevelt for President through Deets Pickett. They also carry the story that certain alleged spokesmen for the Republican Party are proposing a resubmission plank which is dry, although these spokesmen claim it is wet. The wets will stand for neither one of these double-crossing movements. Real wets, both Republicans and Democrats, oppose straddling, trimming, and trading.

The alleged wet Republican plank is drier than the resubmission plank proposed by former Governor Byrd, of Virginia, and Bishop Cannon, because the former advocates that a State can not go wet until two-thirds of the State legislature has adopted a wet resolution, after which the question may be submitted to popular vote in the State. The joker in this tricky plank is revealed by the fact that, as Governor Byrd says, many State legislatures are controlled by the rural element of the State, and the rural element is practically always dry.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield one and one-half minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL].

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Speaker, as coauthor of this bill I wish to speak particularly to the farming interest that is represented on this floor. If this bill is passed providing for 2.75 per cent beer by weight, which is nonintoxicating, it will create a market to the farmers of the sale of 120,000,000 bushels of grain per year. It will bring into the United States Treasury $500,000,000 per year in revenue. It will disqualify the bootlegger and it will save this country from the present debauch which it is in.

The Members who represent the farming interest in this country should see that the legislation that has taken place in the past is driving our farm products to foreign countries. I estimate that 200,000,000 bushels of American grains have been displaced by tropically raised products in manufacturing soft drinks, whereas all American grain was used in the manufacture of beer. Forty million bushels of grain is now substituted for Cuban blackstrap molasses to manufacture the alcohol, and the starch made from corn will soon be driven from the Atlantic coast along with the distilleries in favor of tapioca imported from Java.

When that is done, what hope is there to be held out to the farmer if he is denied a chance to sell his grain to the brewing industry? Then the last peg will be pulled, and the farmer will remain under this terrible depression. Pass this bill and you will aid the farmer and you will loosen the grip that crime has on Uncle Sam's throat. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that I have given away practically all the time I had, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will ask that privilege for all his colleagues, I shall not object, but surely everyone has equal rights here.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have the right to revise and extend their remarks.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I renew my first request, to revise and extend my own remarks.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object to any Member extending his own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, in the time left it will be obviously impossible to discuss the bill carefully. This is the first chance we have had to vote on modifying the Volstead Act and also raise $500,000,000 of revenue.

What we are asking is a chance to consider the bill in the House. We asked the Ways and Means Committee if they would consider it. To-day the chairman of that committee says the Judiciary Committee has jurisdiction of amending the Volstead Act. I notice, though, that the Ways and Means Committee took jurisdiction of the birth control act. [Laughter.]

We heard the gentleman from Texas read on the floor to-day statements of Robert Ingersoll. I am reliably informed, Mr. Speaker, that the most beautiful and most eloquent tribute ever given to corn whisky was pronounced by the same Robert Ingersoll. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, all we ask is a chance to vote on this measure.

About a month ago the distinguished Speaker himself took the floor and made a plea to the Members who loved their country to stand up. To-day I again call on you who are interested in the finances of the country, who want to raise revenue, balance the Budget, and relieve unemployment to stand up now and cast your votes for the motion so we may lay the bill before the House for consideration. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the Committee on Ways and Means be discharged from further consideration of the bill H. R. 10017?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 169, nays 228, answered "present" 1, not voting 34, as follows:

So the motion was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Mr. Boylan (for) with Mr. Allgood (against).
Mr. Corning (for) with Mr. Davenport (against).
Mr. Coyle (for) with Mr. Rayburn (against).
Mr. Fiesinger (for) with Mr. Goodwin (against).
Mr. Boehne (for) with Mr. Kerr (against).
Mr. Tucker (for) with Mr. Shallenberger (against).
Mr. Lamneck (for) with Mr. Milligan (against).
Mr. Peavey (for) with Mr. Hare (against).
Mr. Lea (for) with Mr. Chapman (against).

General pairs:

Mr. McClintic of Oklahoma with Mr. Clague.
Mr. Oliver of Alabama with Mr. Shreve.
Mrs. Owen with Mr. Bohn.
Mr. Drane with Mr. Kendall.
Mr. Collier with Mr. Murphy.
Mr. Cannon with Mr. Seiberling.
Mr. Abernethy with Mr. Chase.
Mr. Yon with Mr. Welsh of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] is unavoidably absent on official business. If he were present, he would vote "no."

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MILLIGAN] is unavoidably absent. Were he present, he would vote "no."

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN] is unavoidably absent on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "no."

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN] is confined in a hospital in New York seriously ill. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] authorized me to state that he is unavoidably absent on account of illness; that if he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] is unavoidably absent on account of illness. If present, he would vote "no."

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I am recorded as voting "no." I have a general pair with the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCLINTIC]. I therefore withdraw my pair and answer present.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BOEHNE] is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. CORNING] is unavoidably absent. Had he been present, he would have voted "yea."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. CRISP, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion was rejected was laid on the table.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL HEARINGS OF THE COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 232

Resolved, That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the printing act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 1,000 additional copies of Part 1 of the hearings held before said committee during the current session on the bill (H. R. 10517) entitled "For increasing and stabilizing the price level of commodities, and for other purposes."

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Do these hearings relate to the Goldsborough bill?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That bill is behind us.

Mr. STEVENSON. But the demand for these hearings from the country is very great. The Committee on Printing felt it was justified in allowing them to have 1,000 additional copies.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Is the country trying to find out what the bill means?

Mr. STEVENSON. I am not prepared to say what the country is trying to do, but they have this large demand for them.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. What will it cost to print these additional copies?

Mr. STEVENSON. Three hundred and sixty dollars.

The resolution was agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS IN HOUSE FOLDING ROOM

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I have a report from the superintendent of the folding room to the effect that there are over 1,000,000 documents there which should be disposed of for this reason: The folding room will be moved into the new folding room of the new House Office Building. These documents have been accumulating for 30 years. Many of them are absolutely useless, while many of them are of value. I have prepared a resolution and a list of the documents, which I will put in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, with a view to calling it up sometime during the week. This action will be in accordance with the action taken in 1910, when the folding room was last cleared out.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, the gentleman is making this statement for the information of the House and later on he will present his resolution?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes. I am inserting the resolution and the list in the RECORD in order that the Members may know what is there and what it is proposed to do with the documents.

Mr. PITTENGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. PITTENGER. The committee proposes that Members who want to use these documents, we will say agricultural yearbooks two or three years old, for example, will have some way of getting them?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes. The proposition is that they are there now to the credit of the Members. The purpose is to do what was done in 1910. Members will have 30 days' notice of the documents which they have to their credit. After the 30 days have expired a list will be submitted to Members by the Doorkeeper, and then the Members generally will have the right to go to the folding room and take what is left, after the Members have had 30 days in which to draw out the documents they have there to their credit. Then what is left, after the Members generally have had 30 days in which to get from the remaining supply what they need or what they desire, will go to the departments. The departments will have 10 days in which to decide whether they desire any of those left, and after that those that are left will be disposed of as waste paper.

Mr. PITTENGER. I just wanted to make certain that Members are informed and that the people in the folding room carry out these instructions.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. In order that the gentleman may be satisfied as to what is to be done I am putting in the RECORD a list of the documents that are there. The gentleman will find from that list that there are 615,000 Agricultural Yearbooks, running from 1906 up to the present time, and other things of that kind. It is the intention to make those documents available to Members of this Congress, and we are asking the Members to take them away from the folding room before the folding room is moved to the new Office Building.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Are they to be distributed according to districts?

Mr. STEVENSON. They are now there to the credit of different districts, and every man who represents a district will have so many of these to his credit.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Does that include maps as well as cattle and horse books?

Mr. STEVENSON. It includes all that is in the folding room and the folding room only. The gentleman can get full information from the list which I will put in the RECORD, along with this proposed resolution. I will say to the gentleman that it does not include horse and cattle books.

Mr. SNELL. How long shall we have to take these documents out of the folding room?

Mr. STEVENSON. Thirty days after the passage of this resolution. They will be asked to take those documents which are to their credit out of the folding room within 30 days. If they do not take them all, then the Members generally will have 30 days in which to get what they want, and at the expiration of that time the department will have 10 days in which to take what they want, after which the remaining documents will be disposed of as waste paper.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert this proposed resolution and list in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution and list referred to follow:

Resolved, That the documents now in the folding room of the House of Representatives, described in the list hereafter set forth under the heading "List of documents," shall be disposed of in the following manner:

First. Members, Delegates, Commissioners from Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands, and officers of the House having such documents to their credit may dispose of the same in the usual manner at any time within 30 days from the date of the adoption of this resolution by the House.

Second. Upon the expiration of the said 30 days, the Doorkeeper shall furnish to the Members of the House, as promptly as practicable, a list of the documents herein referred to then remaining in the folding room to his credit, and thereupon such documents shall be subject to the order of such Member or Delegate in the order in which they are applied for, for the period of 30 days after the day when such list shall be furnished by the Doorkeeper.

Third. The Doorkeeper shall furnish a list of all such documents remaining in the folding room at the expiration of the last-named period to the various departments and commissions of the Government at Washington, including the Superintendent of Documents, Smithsonian Institution, Library of Congress, Bureau of American Republics, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and any such documents shall be turned over to any such department, commission, etc., above referred to, in the order in which their application shall be made, and all such documents which shall remain in the folding room for a period of 10 days after such list shall have been furnished to the departments or commissions aforesaid shall be sold by the Doorkeeper as waste paper.

Fourth. No documents which are described in the list aforesaid shall thereafter be returned to the folding room from any source.

A LETTER OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mrs. PRATT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a letter from the President of the United States to Mr. Herbert S. Crocker, president of the American Society of Civil Engineers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mrs. PRATT. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

MAY 21, 1932.

HERBERT S. CROCKER,
President American Society of Civil Engineers,
New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR MR. CROCKER: I am in receipt of your kind letter of May 19, and I have also the presentation of the subcommittee of the society suggesting that the depression can be broken by a large issue of Federal Government bonds to finance a new program of huge expansion of "public works" construction, in addition to the already large programs now provided for in the current budgets. The same proposals have been made from other quarters and have been given serious consideration during the past few days.

The back of the depression can not be broken by any single Government undertaking. That can only be done with the cooperation of business, banking, industry, and agriculture in conjunction with the Government. The aid the Government may give includes: (a) The quick, honest balancing of the Federal Budget through drastic reduction of less necessary expenses and the minimum increase in taxes; (b) the avoidance of issue of further Treasury securities as the very keystone of national and international confidence, upon which all employment rests; (c) the continuation of the work of the Reconstruction Corporation, which has overcome the financial strain on thousands of small banks, releasing credit to their communities, the strengthening of building and loan associations, the furnishing of credit to agriculture, the protection of trustee institutions, and the support of financial stability of the railways; (d) the expansion of credit by the Federal reserve banks; (e) the organized translation of these credits into actualities for business and public bodies; (f) unceasing effort at sound strengthening of the foundations of agriculture; (g) the continuation of such public works in aid to unemployment as does not place a strain on the taxpayer and do not necessitate Government borrowing; (h) continuation of national, community, and individual efforts in relief of distress; (i) the introduction of the 5-day week in Government, which would save the discharge of 100,000 employees and would add 30,000 to the present list; (j) the passage of the home loan discount bank legislation, which would protect home owners from foreclosure and would furnish millions of dollars of employment in home improvement without cost to the Treasury; (k) financial aid by means of loans from the Reconstruction Corporation to such States as, due to the long strain, are unable to continue to finance distress relief; (l) the extension of the authority of the Reconstruction Corporation not only in a particular to which I called attention last December—that is, loans on sound security to industry where they would sustain and expand employment—but also in view of the further contraction of credit to increase its authority to expand the issue of its own securities up to $3,000,000,000 for the purpose of organized aid to "income-producing" works throughout the Nation, both of public and private character.

1. The vice in that segment of the proposals made by your society and others for further expansion of public works is that they include public works of remote usefulness; they impose unbearable burdens upon the taxpayer; they unbalance the Budget and demoralize Government credit. A larger and far more effective relief to unemployment at this stage can be secured by increased aid to income-producing works. I wish to emphasize this distinction between what for purposes of this discussion we may term "income-producing works" (also referred to as "self-liquidating works") on the one hand and nonproductive public works on the other. By income-producing works I mean such projects of States, counties, and other subdivisions as waterworks, toll bridges, toll tunnels, docks, and any other such activities which charge for their service and whose earning capacity provides a return upon the investment.

With the return of normal times the bonds of such official bodies based upon such projects can be disposed of to the investing public and thus make the intervention of the Reconstruction Corporation purely an emergency activity. I include in this class aid to established industry where it would sustain and increase employment with the safeguard that loans for these purposes should be made on sound security, and the proprietors of such industries should provide a portion of the capital. Nonproductive public works in the sense of the term here used include public buildings, highways, streets, river and harbor improvement, military and navy construction, etc., which bring no direct income and comparatively little relief to unemployment.

2. I can perhaps make this distinction clear by citing the example of the recent action of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the matter of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. on one hand and the recent bill passed by the House of Representatives for increased road building on the other. The railroad company applied to the Reconstruction Corporation for a loan of $55,000,000 to help finance a fund of over $68,000,000 needed to electrify certain of its lines. By so doing it would employ directly and indirectly for one year more than 28,000 men distributed over 20 different States. An arrangement was concluded by which the Reconstruction Corporation undertook to stand behind the plan to the extent of $27,000,000, the railway company finding the balance. This $27,000,000 is to be loaned on sound securities and will be returned, capital and interest, to the corporation. The Reconstruction Corporation is acting as agent to make available otherwise timid capital for the Pennsylvania Railroad in providing employment. There is no charge upon the taxpayer. On the other hand, the proposal of the House of Representatives is to spend $132,000,000 for subsidies to the States for construction of highways. This would be a direct charge on the taxpayer. The total number of men to be directly employed is estimated at 35,000 and indirectly 20,000 more.

In other words, by this action we would give employment to only 55,000 men at the expense by the Government of $132,000,000, which will never be recovered. In the one instance we recover the money advanced through the Reconstruction Corporation, we issue no Government bonds, we have no charge on the taxpayer. In the other instance we have not only a direct cost to the taxpayer but also a continuing maintenance charge, and furthermore, the highways in many sections have now been expanded beyond immediate public need.

3. These proposals of huge expansion of "public works" have a vital relation to balancing the Federal Budget and to the stabilizing of national credit. The financing of "income-producing works" by the Reconstruction Corporation is an investment operation, requires no congressional appropriation, does not unbalance the Budget, is not a drain upon the Treasury, does not involve the direct issue of Government bonds, does not involve added burdens upon the taxpayer either now or in the future. It is an emergency operation which will liquidate itself with the return of the investor to the money markets.

The proposal to build nonproductive "public works" of the category I have described necessitates making increased appropriations by the Congress. These appropriations must be financed by immediate increased taxation or by the issuance of Government bonds. Whatever the method employed, they are inescapably a burden upon the taxpayer. If such a course is adopted beyond the amounts already provided in the Budget now before Congress for the next fiscal year, it will upset all possibility of balancing the Budget; it will destroy confidence in Government securities and make for the instability of the Government which in result will deprive more people of employment than will be gained.

4. I have for many years advocated the speeding up of public works in times of depression as an aid to business and unemployment. That has been done upon a huge scale and is proceeding at as great a pace as fiscal stability will warrant. All branches of government—Federal, State, and municipal—have greatly expanded their "public works" and have now reached a stage where they have anticipated the need for many such works for a long time to come. Therefore the new projects which might be undertaken are of even more remote usefulness. From January, 1930, to July 1, 1932, the Federal Government will have expended $1,500,000,000 on "public works."

The Budget for the next fiscal year carries a further $575,000,000 of such expenditures (compared with about $250,000,000 normal) and includes all the items I have felt are justified by sound engineering and sound finance. Thus by the end of next year the Federal Government will have expended over $2,000,000,000 on public works, which represents an increase over normal of perhaps $1,200,000,000. Thus we have largely anticipated the future and have rendered further expansion beyond our present program of very remote usefulness and certainly not justified for some time to come, even were there no fiscal difficulties. They represent building of a community beyond its necessities. We can not thus squander ourselves into prosperity.

5. A still further and overriding reason for not undertaking such program of further expansions of Federal "public works" is evident if we examine the individual projects which might be undertaken from an engineering and economic point of view. The Federal "public works" now authorized by law cover works which it was intended to construct over a long term of years and embrace several projects which were not of immediate public usefulness. In any event, the total of such authorized projects still incomplete on the 1st of July will amount to perhaps $1,300,000,000. If we deduct from this at once the budgeted program for the next fiscal year—$575,000,000—we leave roughly $725,000,000 of such authorized works which would be open for action. If we examine these projects in detail, we find great deductions must be made from this sum. Construction of many projects physically require years for completion, such as naval vessels, buildings, canalization of rivers, etc., and therefore as an engineering necessity this sum could only be expended over four or five years; a portion of the projects not already started will require legal and technical preparation and therefore could not be brought to the point of employment of labor during the next year; a portion of these authorized projects are outside continental United States and do not contribute to the solution of our problem; a portion are in localities where there is little unemployment; a portion are in the District of Columbia where we already have a large increase in program for the next fiscal year and where no additional work could be justified.

A portion are of remote utility and are not justified, such as extension of agricultural acreage at the present time. Deducting all these cases from the actual list of authorized Federal public works, it will be found that there is less than $100,000,000 (and this is doubtful) which could be expended during the next fiscal year beyond the program in the Budget. That means the employment of, say, less than 40,000 men. Thus the whole of these grandiose contentions of possible expansion of Federal "public works" fall absolutely to the ground for these reasons if there were no other.

If it is contemplated that we legislate more authorizations of new and unconsidered projects by Congress, we shall find ourselves confronted by a logrolling process which will include dredging of mud creeks, building of unwarranted post offices, unprofitable irrigation projects, duplicate highways, and a score of other unjustifiable activities.

6. There is still another phase of this matter to which I would like to call attention. Employment in "public works" is largely transitory. It does not have a follow-up of continued employment, as is the case with "income-producing works." But of even more importance than this, the program I have proposed gives people employment in all parts of the country in their normal jobs under normal conditions at the normal place of abode, tends to reestablish normal processes in business and industry, and will do so on a much larger scale than the projects proposed in the so-called public-works program.

7. To sum up, it is generally agreed that the balancing of the Federal Budget and unimpaired national credit is indispensable to the restoration of confidence and to the very start of economic recovery. The administration and Congress have pledged themselves to this end. A public-works program such as is suggested by your committee and by others, through the issuance of Federal bonds, creates at once an enormous further deficit.

What is needed is the return of confidence and a capital market through which credit will flow in the thousand rills with its result of employment and increased prices. That confidence will be only destroyed by action in these directions. These channels will continue clogged by fears if we continue attempts to issue large amounts of Government bonds for purposes of nonproductive works.

Such a program as these huge Federal loans for "public works" is a fearful price to pay in putting a few thousand men temporarily at work and dismissing many more thousands of others from their present employment. There is vivid proof of this since these proposals of public works financed by Government bonds were seriously advanced a few days ago. Since then United States Government bonds have shown marked weakness on the mere threat. And it is followed at once by a curtailment of the ability of States, municipalities, and industry to issue bonds and thus a curtailment of activities which translate themselves into decreased employment.

It will serve no good purpose and will fool no one to try to cover appearances by resorting to a so-called extraordinary Budget. That device is well known. It brought the governments of certain foreign countries to the brink of financial disaster. It means a breach of faith to holders of all Government securities, an unsound financial program, and a severe blow to returning confidence and further contraction of economic activities in the country.

What you want and what I want is to restore normal employment. I am confident that if the program I have proposed to the Congress is expeditiously completed and we have the cooperation of the whole community, we will attain the objective for which we have been searching so long.

Yours faithfully,

HERBERT HOOVER.

REREFERENCE OF A BILL

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 660), a claims bill erroneously referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, be rereferred to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman consulted the chairman of the Committee on Claims?

Mr. HOWARD. He has.

The SPEAKER. Is it agreeable to the chairman of that committee?

Mr. HOWARD. It is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

ECONOMY LEGISLATION IN THE HOUSE

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes on a matter that I think the House will be interested in.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, the leading editorial headed Defense Against Pork, which was published in the Washington Post on yesterday, grossly misrepresents the accomplishments of the House of Representatives during this session. The opening paragraph reads as follows:

> Virtually every effort the House has made toward economy at the present session has turned out to be a fiasco. The latest example is the War Department appropriation bill. As sent to the Senate, this measure carries only one substantial cut in expenditures, and that strikes at the very heart of national security.

That is not only a very reckless statement, but there is not one line of truth in it. Everyone knows, of course, that the Washington Post is an intensely partisan paper and that it seldom sees anything of value in what a Democrat either proposes or accomplishes. However, I am not going to accuse the writer of that editorial of intentionally misrepresenting the House or seeking to lend aid to the evident movement which is under way to magnify the Executive and at the same time to depreciate and raise opposition to the legislative branch of the Government. Such a movement has been under way for several weeks, and ever since the President sent his message to Congress in which he plainly endeavored to cast blame, not only upon the Democrats but the Republicans in Congress for any failure to reduce expenditures.

I am not going to comment upon this unpatriotic propaganda which is being spread over the country. I am willing that both the executive and legislative branches shall have due credit for everything they seek to accomplish, and those who would seek to unjustly destroy the confidence of the people in either one are doing a distinct disservice to the country.

The writer of the editorial evidently does not read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, nor is he even faintly familiar with what has been going on in Congress, for he shows the greatest ignorance throughout the editorial. He says that "every effort the House has made toward economy at the present session has turned out to be a fiasco." He ignores the fact that the only real economy which has been put into effect at this session up to this time has been done by the House of Representatives. The Committee on Appropriations has reduced the estimates of the President more than $161,000,000; and I have repeatedly declared that this is a distinct saving, since there will be no necessity for deficiencies to cover these reductions. Mark you, this was reduction under what the President asked, and it was only after the committee began to reduce his estimates that the President began to send in his messages urging reductions in the estimates which he had submitted two or three months before.

The House in every instance approved the recommendations of the committee except in the case of the War Department bill, where, in three instances, it added to the amount recommended sums aggregating nearly $6,000,000. But in the meantime the House had approved further reductions made in the Interior Department bill amounting to over five million. So, after all the reductions actually made by the House up to this time have exceeded $161,000,000 in the estimates submitted by the President.

In addition to this, the House passed the so-called economy bill, which is now pending in the Senate. While it was greatly reduced and changed in the House, nevertheless it made savings which some have estimated amount to $42,000,000 in the way of reduction of salaries and other reductions and consolidations. When the tax bill was pending in the House, it was stated that if there were reductions amounting to $200,000,000 the Budget would be balanced; and I submit that the House has already made reductions amounting to over $200,000,000; and there are other reductions to come in the annual appropriation bills which are now pending in the Senate and also in the economy bill which is pending in that body.

I submit therefore that the writer of the editorial was far from the truth when he said that the House had made no progress toward economy.

He is also wide from the truth when he states that the War Department appropriation bill as it passed the House carried only one substantial cut in expenditures, evidently referring to the reduction in officer personnel from 12,000 to 10,000. Notwithstanding additions of nearly $6,000,000 made on the floor of the House, the War Department appropriation bill carried a reduction of over $18,000,000 as it left the House, and these reductions were made in the matter of supplies and other expenditures not relating to the personnel. The reduction in officer personnel saved only $4,000,000. So you see that the writer of the editorial again evidences his ignorance of just what is going on up here on Capitol Hill.

The editorial further states:

> The House Appropriations Committee slashed a considerable number of items, including training activities, the number of officers in active service, and the allowance to rivers and harbors. After a heated fight on the floor the House restored all the funds for training-camp activities and the development of rivers and harbors. But 2,000 officers, who are a vital part of the nucleus from which the machinery of national defense must be built in times of emergency, were cut off.
> Every attempt to reduce the $60,000,000 allotment for rivers and harbors was defeated. This is a pork-barrel appropriation. A substantial saving in this work might have been effected without sacrificing any national interest. But every Congressman feels an urge to demonstrate his ability to bring home the bacon just before a national election. Nothing is so certain to escape the economy knife as the pork barrel.

May I call your attention to the fact that the committee did not reduce the estimate for rivers and harbors, and, while there was a motion made to reduce it on the floor of the House, it was defeated by an overwhelming vote. That appropriation is in no sense a "pork-barrel" appropriation. The War Department asked for $75,000,000 for the year 1933 and the Chief of Engineers stated that all of it was needed. The Budget, however, reduced the request of the department to $60,000,000 and the Committee on Appropriations and the House allowed this sum and no more. If it was a "pork-barrel" appropriation, then the President and the Budget are as much responsible as the House.

I submit, however, that it can not possibly be so described. It is singular that the editorial should have taken this position in its desire to criticize the House of Representatives, when to-day propositions are pending providing for billions of dollars for construction work. How inconsistent it would have been to reduce this appropriation in the light of what may actually be done before Congress adjourns, when it is to be devoted purely to construction work and we all know that this kind of public work affords more employment in comparison with the money appropriated than any other sort of construction. Any reduction that might have been made in this appropriation would have been merely a "paper savings," and I am opposed to that kind of appropriations. Let me say, parenthetically, that I have observed that in the opinion of some Washington newspapers any appropriation that is made for construction outside the District of Columbia is "pork barrel." But if it is made for construction in the District of Columbia it is evidence of the wisest statesmanship. The editorial concludes with the statement:

> When the welfare of the Nation is thus subordinated to sectional and political interests it is not surprising that the people lose faith in the House of Representatives as a responsible agency of Government in these critical times.

I wish to protest against what appears to be a concerted effort to minimize the accomplishments of the legislative branch of the Government and at the same time magnify the statesmanship of the executive for political purposes. Fortunately the people at large know more about what Congress is doing than the writer of this editorial, if this editorial is the measure of his knowledge of what is going on. No one can take exception to the printing of the facts. Neither can exception be taken to a newspaper of pronounced political leanings doing what it can to promote the interest of the party which it represents. But everyone ought to be fair, and particularly a great metropolitan newspaper which serves as a medium of information for members of both parties. The newspapers of the country have become the greatest influence in this country to-day, and this very fact should make responsible newspapers careful to use this influence in a fair and impartial way and not to distort the facts with a view of misleading their readers. Particularly is this true of editorials which are supposed to be educational and to influence those who read them. There is no higher calling than that of the editor of a great newspaper and he of all men should be careful to inform himself on every subject upon which he writes, so that he may not be subject to the charge of having misled those who read what he says with a degree of confidence.

Since the writer of this editorial evidently never reads the RECORD and pays no attention to what is being done in Congress, he will probably never read what I have said. But I wish to say that if he wishes to be entirely fair to the House of Representatives and its membership on both sides of the Chamber, he will write an editorial apologizing for the one which appeared on yesterday and give it the same degree of publicity.

It is not only due the House of Representatives and the thousands of readers of his paper, but it is due himself as a responsible editorial writer upon a great metropolitan newspaper. There is not one line of truth in the entire editorial, and a paper which permits itself to be used to disseminate false information to its thousands of subscribers can not hope to long maintain its great influence. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ESLICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended one minute so that I may ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. ESLICK. The gentleman stated that the Army appropriation bill was reduced $18,000,000 as it left the House. To make the statement clear, that is the reduction under the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget brought about by the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. BYRNS. That is true.

NATURALIZATION

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up conference report on the bill (H. R. 6477) to further amend the naturalization laws, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SNELL. What is it, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands this is a unanimous report, and the gentleman from New York is anxious to get it attended to to-day and has stated to the Chair it will only take a minute.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. It is a conference report, and the report is unanimous.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6477) to further amend the naturalization laws, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the same, without amendment.

SAMUEL DICKSTEIN,
JNO. W. MOORE,
ALBERT JOHNSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

H. D. HATFIELD,
HIRAM W. JOHNSON,
WILLIAM H. KING,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 6477) to further amend the naturalization laws, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The only amendment by the Senate objected to by the House was section 8 as the bill passed the Senate.

Apparently, the objection by the House was based upon the premise that the enactment of this section 8 would incur considerable additional expense to compile statistics which belong to the Bureau of the Census.

The fact is that the compiling and reporting upon these statistics from the records in the custody of the Bureau of Naturalization were authorized and directed in section 10 of the act approved March 2, 1929 (45 Stat. 1516; U. S. C., Sup. V., 8, sec. 399 e). The purpose of section 8 is to require the completion and reporting of these statistics, as they relate to the 1910 census, before January 31, 1933; and, as they relate to the 1920 census, before December 31, 1933.

Relative to the incurrence of considerable additional expense—either in money, time, or use of personnel—there is submitted the following extract from a letter from the Secretary of Labor, Hon. William N. Doak, under date of May 10, 1932, which was considered by the conferees:

> Your inquiries with respect to section 8 of this bill have been taken up with the Commissioner of Naturalization, who advises that more than the equivalent of the work has been performed that relates to the compilation required by January 31, 1933, and he believes the compilation covering the 1920 census can be completed without additional cost by December 31, 1933.
> The main part of this work consists of assembling together the declarations, petitions, and certificates of citizenship in the respective cases, now representing over 3,000,000 certificates. This assembling work has been carried on for years, in order to effect a complete consolidation of the files of the bureau. This consolidation work is necessary to the economical handling of the tremendous volume of correspondence coming into the bureau and should continue gradually to be accomplished. The actual work of preparing a report upon the statistics that will be available upon the assembling of the papers is believed to be rather insignificant in the point of money, time, and personnel. The statement is made that from the present view of appropriation probabilities for 1933 there will be sufficient to carry on this work, and it is believed that no portion of the work that is now being carried on should be suspended, as the application of the personnel to the assembling of naturalization papers in the files is of distinct economic value.

The conferees further ascertained that authority to provide the tabulating and other equipment from the miscellaneous expense appropriation of the Bureau of Naturalization will necessitate the acquisition of such equipment without additional appropriations and will avoid the necessity for additional amounts to be provided in the appropriation for contingent expenses of the Department of Labor.

SAMUEL DICKSTEIN,
JNO. W. MOORE,
ALBERT JOHNSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will recollect that it was amendment No. 8 that I raised objection to. I stated that I feared it would entail considerable expense to the Treasury if such work was undertaken. Has the gentleman made any inquiry what this compilation will cost?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The Secretary of Labor, through his representative, assured the conferees there would be no added expense, not even a dollar, in the compilation of this work. They will not ask for any money, for none will be needed.

Mr. STAFFORD. They say they will not ask for additional money, and they believe the compilation covering the 1920 census can be completed without additional cost by December 31, 1933, but here the gentleman is asking for some new work in the compilation for censuses 1910, 1920, and 1930, predicated on the statement that the appropriations are sufficient. If the appropriations were not utilized for compilations, they would revert to the Treasury.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman's objection to the whole bill was whether or not there was additional revenue required for the purposes of completing the statistics, and I assure the gentleman that it has been assured by the Secretary of Labor's representative that there will be no expense.

The conference report was agreed to.

OPENING AND CLOSING OF ROADS ON LANDS OWNED BY THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA AT OCCOQUAN, VA.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 1768) to provide for the opening and closing of roads within the boundaries of the District of Columbia workhouse property at Occoquan, Fairfax County, Va., and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the lady from New Jersey?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

TO REGULATE SALE OF SECURITIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9065) to supervise and regulate the sale of securities within the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. THOMASON in the chair.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 18, after the word "duty," strike out the language "nor to any national bank or trust company organized under an act of the Congress and transacting business as a bank or trust company within the District of Columbia."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment.

Mr. Chairman, if we could secure from the District Committee a list of the various bills that are to be called up to-day, and the manner in which they are to be called up in their order, we could save a great deal of time, because those of us who have objections to certain bills could then be prepared to meet them without watching the entire calendar. I have tried to get from the committee the order in which they are to be called up, but it was refused. I suggest to the committee that if they would give us a list it would aid us and aid the committee.

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; not now. I yielded to the lady once, and she was not quite courteous, and I learned not to yield to her.

My colleague from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], who is a Member of the District Committee, called attention to one very serious objection to this bill—that unless it is remedied the bill ought to be defeated. The general public is interested in it because under the language it is possible for some slick-tongued agent to sell them worthless securities in all of the States of the Union.

My colleague [Mr. PATMAN], a member of the committee, who has studied the bill carefully, called attention to the fact that if the bill is passed as it is written an agent who gets a license here can sell securities to everyone else except in the District of Columbia without having his securities investigated. In other words, in the sale of securities in 48 States there will be no restrictions placed on him whatever. After he once registers and gets his license he can go out and dupe our constituents in every one of the 48 States by selling them worthless securities. That ought to be remedied. The bill ought not to pass without being amended in that respect.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. HARLAN. Does not the gentleman think that is a proposition to be governed by the laws of the different States? Obtaining a license to sell securities in the District of Columbia is not of itself a license to sell securities outside of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, but my friend was not here evidently and did not hear the argument of my colleague [Mr. PATMAN]. If he had been here and listened to my colleague, as I did, with careful attention, and caught what he had to say about this bill, he would see that his constituents and mine could be duped. I get complaints practically every week from every direction where some credulous person who has not yet learned to watch and scrutinize the actions of people closely, who still believes that all people are honest, has been taken in and where his life's earnings have been wiped out in the purchase of securities not worth 5 cents. That is what I have in mind. I am not yet ready to swallow every bill that is sent over here from somewhere else. I am not yet ready to take it as a mocking bird as being the proper thing to swallow. I want to scrutinize it myself. Until that defect in the bill mentioned by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] is remedied, I am going to vote against the bill.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I hope this bill will be defeated. It will probably hinder the enactment of good legislation if it is enacted into law. Its provisions are not sufficient to prevent fraud. No one can claim that it will. If the bill is enacted, it will then be said that we have a law against the sale of fraudulent securities in the District of Columbia, and very little or no effort will be made to enact a real law with teeth in it. This is not a good bill. It will not protect the people if it is enacted into law. It will be harmful and detrimental to the people. It is not in the interest of the general welfare. It is against the interest of the general welfare.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. In my home State we have a very good blue sky law relating to the scrutinizing of the character of securities that we permit to be sold in the State. As I recall, we have no law similar to this, which seeks to register the salesmen of these securities. As I view this, it is in line with the gentleman's statement and is more or less of a camouflage for the passage of a real blue sky law.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman is correct, and I thank him for his contribution. No State in America has enacted more good legislation for the benefit of the people than the State of Wisconsin. If I am not mistaken, this bill is sponsored by the Investment Bankers Association of America. I am not very much in sympathy with anything the investment bankers are in favor of right now just because they favor it, although I shall be glad to consider whatever they wish sympathetically.

When this bill was under consideration by the District Committee I had considerable correspondence, or perhaps we had better call it propaganda, from the Investment Bankers Association of America, wanting legislation of this character. If I am incorrect in that, I should be glad to be corrected, and if any one is present who says it is not sponsored by the Investment Bankers Association, I shall be glad to yield to him. I do not believe that Al Capone was the greatest racketeer in this Nation, although he was considered a great racketeer. I think some of our international bankers are the greatest racketeers in the Nation. I think more attention should be given to what they have done. They have flooded this country with worthless stocks and bonds, foreign securities, securities they knew were worthless when they permitted the people of the Nation to buy them. Anything in aid of the people who are really the greatest racketeers not only in America but in the whole world I certainly am not going to indorse. I do not accuse those who support this legislation of trying to help this class of people, but I do say that you should not insist on a bill here that has no teeth in it, that has no power on earth to stop the real evil, but will only stand in the way of enactment of good legislation. What does the bill do? They will even license people who have been to the penitentiary for committing the very offense which you propose to enact a law against.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. What character of bill does the gentleman suggest to protect the people of the District of Columbia?

Mr. PATMAN. We can discuss only the bill that is before us at this time. I hoped the gentleman would not insist on a bill that would permit the licensing of these men who have only recently been convicted of fraud in the District of Columbia when they return from the penitentiary. Under this bill they can be licensed again to sell securities here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BOWMAN. After two years. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. If the gentleman objects to this bill because of this provision, I am perfectly willing to eliminate it.

Mr. PATMAN. I object not only to that, but the bill establishes a commission and permits them to employ any number of people at salaries that they fix, any number of experts they desire, and if you gentlemen believe in establishing new bureaus, new boards, new commissions, putting additional people on the pay roll, you should vote for the bill. It is a bill to enforce a law and placing it in charge of the department of insurance in the District. They are not lawyers. They know nothing about enforcing the criminal law.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes. I want to ask him some questions about this bill.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. What is before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. DYER. How far had the Clerk read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk had read down to line 21 on page 3, the first section.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for one minute so I may ask a question about this bill.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I shall not object; but after this I shall make the point, under the rule, to proceed in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to interpose objection, even at the risk of a call of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman want us to find out something about this measure?

Mr. PALMISANO. It has been continuously objected to by the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland object?

Mr. PALMISANO. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have a quorum. If we are going to start that kind of business, I shall make the point of no quorum. We are not going to pass this kind of measure without debate, I can tell the gentleman that. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. THOMASON). Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 85]

Abernethy	Crowther	Johnson, S. Dak.	Oliver, Ala.
Aldrich	Crump	Karch	Owen
Allgood	Culkin	Kelly, Pa.	Parker, N. Y.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. THOMASON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 9065, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the Clerk to call the roll, when 328 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he handed in a list of absentees for printing in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its sittings.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that it was necessary to call the membership from their offices at this time. I know how busy every Member of Congress is and how anxious we are to do the Nation's business. I am very sorry there seems to be a feeling in the House that the business of the District of Columbia is not the Nation's business.

Since I have been chairman of this committee we have had a great deal of trouble in bringing before the House legislation for the District of Columbia. It seems there are certain Members of the House who are insistent upon blocking everything that is for the benefit of the District. I appeal to the Members for their cooperation, and I say to you there is not a harder working committee in the House than the Committee on the District of Columbia. We work in that committee without any personal gain. It does not make a particle of difference to the people back home in our districts what we do for the District of Columbia; but since the people of the District have no vote, and since we are called upon to legislate for them, I certainly think the Members of the House ought to give us at least their cooperation. May I say, too, that a majority of the Members of the House have given us their cooperation. I do not think there is a better committee in the House than the Committee on the District of Columbia this year. I have nothing but praise for every member of that committee. They have given of their time and ability. When bills have been referred to subcommittees, they have responded and brought in bills to the general committee.

It is not possible for the chairman of the general committee to determine accurately every bill that is brought before this House. We then do the next best thing; call upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to give us their advice. We call upon the counsel of the District to advise us. It is the business of the District, and as such they should be more interested in it than in anything else. I believe they have given us, every time we have called upon them, their honest opinion of bills that have been introduced. A great many of those bills are introduced at the suggestion of the commissioners. The commissioners are responsible to the District of Columbia. Until the people of the District have a vote (and God knows I hope that day will be soon so that it will take away from us this responsibility which nobody seems to want) it is our responsibility. I appeal to you gentlemen to support us.

Ever since I have been chairman of this committee there seems to be a certain gentleman who has tried to block everything before the committee. I believe in calling a spade a spade, and I am going to mention names. I find that the gentleman from Texas is opposed to everything that is brought to the floor of this House. The gentleman does not come to me as man to man and say to me, "I object to this bill and I wish to change it." The gentleman comes on the floor and tries to filibuster all day; and because we will not stand for his filibustering, then he resorts to other means to try to break up this committee. If the gentleman from Texas is going to succeed in this, there is no use of my trying to continue as chairman of the committee. I am trying to do an honest job. It has given me a great deal of concern, and I have worked very hard to fulfill my contract with the people of the District.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the lady yield for a question?

Mrs. NORTON. Not just now. I will not yield until I have finished, and then the gentleman can say anything he wishes.

Mr. PATMAN. I would just like to ask which gentleman from Texas the lady is referring to?

Mrs. NORTON. I refer to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], of course. I supposed all the Members knew that. [Applause.] I did not think it was necessary to state his name. The gentleman from Texas comes to me smiling and says, "I want to help you," and then we bring in our bills.

Does he help? I will ask any of you if you have ever thought he has given me any help? I say he has given me no help, and I say it right to his face. The last day the District Committee had the floor, when I happened to call attention to the fact that he had consumed some two hours of our day and spent a great deal of the Nation's money—for every single page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD costs $60—he did not like it very much.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I believe in giving a lady Member the same right as any other Member, and I shall not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Speaking of to-day's proceeding, we had a bill that seemed to be controversial. This bill, H. R. 9065, was the unfinished business of the last District day. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] objected to the bill. I have nothing to say against his wanting to amend the bill, or any Member of the House wanting to amend the bill, and make it more satisfactory. That is agreeable to the committee. We desire to have your opinion of the bill. We do not consider it a perfect bill. I have never seen a perfect bill. I do not know whether or not any other Member has. But I do think this is a good bill. If you have any doubt about it, I refer you to the report and the indorsements we have received. I am going to mention a few of them in case you have not a copy of the report.

First of all may I state we have held public hearings on the bill, and the bill has been supported by the District Commissioners, by the law and legislative committee of the District of Columbia Bankers' Association, by the law committee of the Washington Board of Trade, and by the committee counsel representing the Investment Bankers' Association of America. Surely they are not all crooks.

Amendments to the bill which clarify certain passages of the proposed legislation were considered by Mr. West, and assistant corporation counsel of the District of Columbia, and have also been approved by the District Commissioners at a public hearing held by the committee. The legislation was also indorsed by a number of prominent business men and residents of the District of Columbia, including such men as Mr. Robert V. Fleming, president of Riggs National Bank, Mr. Corcoran Thom, president of the American Security & Trust Co., Mr. Pope, acting president of the District of Columbia Bankers' Association, Mr. Sidney S. Taliaferro, vice president of the Riggs National, and a great many others. If you have a copy of the report, it will be unnecessary for me to go farther.

The only objection we know of was presented by Mr. O. H. Brinkman, an attorney who appeared before the committee.

In appearing on the Blaine bill Mr. Brinkman stated that he had been formerly employed by the insurance and banking subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate, and in that capacity he had prepared the draft of the Blaine bill (S. 3362). Mr. Brinkman favors the type of law which applies the license principle, which is the principle on which the Blaine bill is based.

May I say further that in reporting the bill out of the District of Columbia Committee the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] was heard and received the right to amend the bill as he pleased in the committee. We had no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. NORTON. I shall be pleased to yield.

Mr. PATMAN. The lady wants to be fair, I know.

Mrs. NORTON. Absolutely fair.

Mr. PATMAN. Does the lady not recall I could not be present at the hearings and that I stated when the bill was brought before the committee that I could not be present but I would not object to the bill going to the floor? I also stated to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BOWMAN] that he could report the bill out and I would reserve my objection until it got to the floor, but I wanted him to say in his report that I reserved the right to object to it on the floor.

I ask the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BOWMAN] now if that is not so, if I may be permitted?

Mr. BOWMAN. I made that statement in the report.

Mr. PATMAN. The lady is mistaken when she states I was at the hearings. I told her I was sorry that I could not be there, but that I did want to be heard when it came up for final passage. I said I felt the bill should be discussed fully in the House. It was 12 o'clock, as I recall, and the reading of the bill would have stopped it until the next week.

I do not think the lady should say I was present and had the privilege of offering amendments because she is mistaken.

Mrs. NORTON. Let me say to the gentleman from Texas the committee felt if the gentleman wanted to amend the bill, it was his privilege here on the floor; but why filibuster? The gentleman talked for one hour when the bill was before the House two weeks ago.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentlewoman yield further?

Mrs. NORTON. I shall be pleased to yield.

Mr. PATMAN. My talk on the bill has been confined to the bill. I expect to offer some amendments because I really do not think it is a good bill.

Mrs. NORTON. We will be pleased to hear the gentleman's amendments.

Mr. PATMAN. I have confined my talk to the bill.

Mrs. NORTON. The gentleman will recall that the last day the bill was before the committee the gentleman took over one-half hour——

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; I took an hour, and practically all of it was on the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. NORTON. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was not this quorum call precipitated by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO], a member of the committee, objecting to a reasonable request that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] be allowed to continue for an additional five minutes?

I tried to prevail upon the gentleman from Maryland to withdraw his objection so as to proceed orderly, but the gentleman in the performance of his privilege, did not. We could have avoided the quorum call had the gentleman from Maryland not objected to the 5-minute extension of time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the lady yield?

Mrs. NORTON. Gladly.

Mr. PATMAN. May I suggest that although the gentleman from Maryland objected to my having 5 additional minutes, he permitted the lady to have 5 additional minutes and 3 more, and I am mighty glad he has.

Mrs. NORTON. This is the first time the lady from New Jersey, the chairman of the committee, has taken up any time of this House. I do not believe in taking up the time of the House on anything that is unnecessary, and any time I have addressed the House it has only been because I felt it absolutely a duty on my part to do so. [Applause.] If every Member of this House was as careful of the time consumed by this House as I am, we would have finished our legislation long ago and be ready to go home by the 10th of June. [Applause.]

Mr. PALMISANO. Will the lady yield?

Mrs. NORTON. Gladly.

Mr. PALMISANO. I want to say in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, with reference to the roll call, that it was not so much the five minutes that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] wanted as it was the action of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and the way the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has been treating this committee since this House has been in session.

Mrs. NORTON. Of course, we all know that.

Mr. PALMISANO. This committee began to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of five bills which had to do with the closing of alleys in the District, bills passed by the Senate, and immediately the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] began to object. It is for that reason that I wanted the House to know and the public to know about his actions. The gentleman from Texas has been doing that constantly. On the last District day he had two roll calls and then consumed one hour of the District's time. For that reason the gentleman from Maryland objected, not so much to the five minutes that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] wanted but because of the actions of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. As a matter of fact, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] did not make the request. It was the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], with his idea of filibustering. That was the only reason he asked for a roll call.

Mrs. NORTON. I think everybody in this House understands the motive behind the "no quorum" calls. It has been done continually, and we know why. I do not ask for any favors because I am a woman, as the gentleman from Texas always intimates. I am a Member of this House and have every privilege that any other Member has, and I intend to exercise that privilege. [Applause.] I want to say further that I regret very much that it was necessary to take the floor to make this explanation. Since I have been chairman of this committee this is the fourth day we have been on the floor, and we could have finished our business and made way for other Members who had important legislation to bring up for action. We do not want to take any undue portion of the time of the House in the consideration of District business, but it does seem that much of the time of the House is taken to appease the vanity of one particular man. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion to strike out the enacting clause. Mr. Chairman, no catty remarks are going to keep me from doing my duty, but I do expect to answer some cat remarks from my friend from Maryland. I asked some questions about this bill. He did not want me to get the information from a member of his committee, Mr. PATMAN, and then I made a point of no quorum. I had a right to do it.

Mr. PALMISANO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I will not yield.

Mr. PALMISANO. Of course not.

Mr. BLANTON. So understand that. I do object to his cat remarks. Now, this bill provides, on page 19, line 7, that "the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia may appoint and employ such additional assistants to the superintendent of insurance as may be necessary," without any limitations. They also are to fix the salaries.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I will not yield.

They fix the number of employees and assistants and the salaries. Are you willing for them to do that? I am not.

I know something about this insurance department. Long before the lady from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] came here and long before the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO] came here I caused an investigation to be made of that insurance department, and I had the insurance commissioner removed for dishonesty and for improper dealings, Insurance Commissioner Miller. I had him removed. They now want to put in the hands of the new commissioner of insurance the right to specify the authority, duties, and designations of his assistants. They want to give him all possible power without any limitation or restriction. That is what I wanted to bring home to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO], and he would not allow me to do it.

I have had the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BOWMAN], the author of this bill, fighting me; when I was after a commissioner himself, Commissioner Fenning, he blocked me at every turn of the road in the committee and every turn of the road on the floor. I had to have that man impeached and run out of office, as he resigned after my hearing at the request of the President, in spite of the gentleman from West Virginia.

I am going to do my duty no matter how many catty remarks are made about me on the floor.

I want to say this, that every Member on this floor knows that two-thirds of the bills that have come from the District Committee in the last 20 years have been bad bills, and we have knocked the enacting clause out of many of them, and it ought to be knocked out of this bill. I know it will not be because there is a feeling here we have got to support our lady Member, and we are going to back her bills, so I know you will not knock out this enacting clause, but you ought to.

The criticism of this bill did not come from me. It came from my colleague [Mr. PATMAN], a member of this committee, "that you can take a convict who has been sent to the penitentiary for selling worthless securities and he can get a license under this bill, and he can go into your State and my State and every one of the 48 States, without any limitations or restrictions, and he can sell worthless securities to every one of the 120,000,000 people of the United States." That criticism was made by my colleague [Mr. PATMAN], a member of the District Committee, and I was warranted in asking him some questions so that all of us could thoroughly understand the bill before we voted for it. My request was reasonable. When the gentleman from Maryland refused to allow such questions to be asked, I was within my rights, and it became my duty to resort to the rules and parlimentary privileges given me, and I demanded that a quorum be present. And because I did this, I was criticized. It is my duty to the people of the United States to stop, if I can, the passage of bad bills like this, that seriously affect their interests.

Do you think I am going to let catty remarks keep me from telling you about bad bills?

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry; I can not yield. Let them take care of themselves. I know how to take care of myself on this floor. [Laughter and applause.] I have been here a long time. If you gentlemen want this kind of a bill to pass, if you want to place this power in the hands of a commissioner of insurance, whose predecessor was removed for dishonesty and removed by my investigation, if you please, vote for the bill and let your constituents suffer.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

It is with a great deal of regret that discussions of this kind come in on a bill of this character. I do not believe anyone would say that any one particular piece of legislation could be considered absolutely perfect, but, nevertheless, this is an effort to do something along this line.

There are three ways we can arrive at the control of fraudulent securities.

We can do nothing, as we are doing now, and wait until somebody has been actually defrauded, as was suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], and then prosecute the man criminally; but this is not a very satisfactory way. It is locking the barn after the horse has been stolen.

The second way is to go after the security itself and establish a bureau to go into the assets of the company, the legality of its incorporation, and everything pertaining to the value of its securities. This includes patent rights, good will, and a great many questions of that kind that you gentlemen who are lawyers in the different States and have had experience with blue-sky departments know about and know how very complicated and very expensive this is and also know that experience in most cases has shown that such efforts are futile.

We have attacked the question at this time in another way—not to go directly at the security, but to go at the man who sells the security and as soon as the man publishes advertising of a defrauding character or sells securities which he knows to be fraudulent, then the commissioner of insurance in the easiest way possible, by injunction or by revoking his license, stops the crime before it is committed.

The question has been raised here by the gentleman from Texas that this opens the door, by licensing these salesmen to go into other States and sell without restriction. This is altogether a matter that is under the control of the various States themselves. If the States do not want an agent licensed in the District of Columbia to sell securities in the State of Ohio or Oklahoma or Pennsylvania, the States can stop it. The licensing of an agent here has nothing to do with anything except selling in the District of Columbia.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Does the gentleman think it is a very good policy to prosecute a man for selling a worthless security and pay no attention to the security itself, and let somebody else go on and sell it?

Mr. HARLAN. I would not say that is perfect; but when you take the other side of the picture, the difficulties in the other class of cases have been greater. When you go after the securities it has been more difficult to ascertain the good from the bad, and another difficulty is that when a security is certified by a blue-sky department, the people say, "Here, this must be a good, bona fide, gilt-edged security. It has the stamp of the blue-sky department on it and it is good," whereas, in fact, it may or may not be good.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. But suppose they make an investigation and say this security is not good. This is what they have to do when they send a man to jail or put him out of business, and why not do it before any harm is done?

Mr. HARLAN. The insurance commissioner here has very liberal powers in that regard.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. Is the gentleman from Kansas aware of the fact that worthless securities issued in the District were sold in various States throughout the Union under the provisions of a blue sky law?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. No.

Mr. BOWMAN. The blue sky law gives them an opportunity to commit fraud, and the State of Minnesota has recently enacted a law which requires a notice to be placed on each certificate of stock to be sold in the State of Minnesota, and the notice is as follows:

NOTICE.—While the laws of the State of Minnesota permit the sale of the attached securities, such legal permission does not mean that the State of Minnesota guarantees the success of the enterprise covered by such securities.

In other words, the indorsement and the recommendation of the State gives greater and greater opportunities for fraud than the injunction type of control.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 7, noes 43.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PATMAN to the committee amendment: Page 3, line 21, after the word "Columbia," insert "unless said companies engage in the sale of foreign securities."

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, the committee will accept that amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. What attitude does the lady from New Jersey take toward the committee amendment—to have the committee amendment defeated, to strike it out, or have it remain in the bill?

Mrs. NORTON. Have it remain in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out paragraph (d).

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LAGUARDIA moves, on page 3, beginning in line 2, to strike out paragraph (d).

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Paragraph (d) provides that the provisions of this act shall not apply to any sale or offer for sale of securities of any bank, bankers, savings bank, trust company, building and loan association, insurance company, or other financial institution. Why are they exempted? At this very time all the financial institutions in this country, with a very few exceptions, are under great stress and difficulty and embarrassment by reason of worthless securities which they purchased and now hold. It has been suggested by a gentleman near me that these banks are exempted because they know what they are doing. Mr. Chairman, they do not, and I make the statement without any reservation.

You can catalogue the banks of this country in two classes; in one class those who sell bad securities and in the other class those who bought bad securities. There is no doubt about that.

I realize the difficulty of the committee in getting any sort of a bill through. I know how difficult it was in previous years.

Let us be frank about it. There was a time, let me say to the lady from New Jersey, when some of the very dirtiest work that went on in the District of Columbia in reference to securities was participated in by a member of the committee, who is now under indictment.

Mr. BLANTON. He was chairman of the District Committee until this session of Congress.

Mrs. NORTON. Does the gentleman think that has anything to do with the present bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; but I understand the difficulty is in getting any sort of a measure of this kind with real teeth in it, anything that will really accomplish the purpose. There are thousands and thousands of small investors in the District of Columbia who have bought worthless stocks and bonds. I want to take this opportunity to refer to the excellent and very efficient public service of Assistant Attorney General Nugent Dodds, who convicted some of these scoundrels.

I want to say to the lady from New Jersey, that before she was a Member of the House, we tried to put through a national blue sky law, and we encountered the same difficulty when we got to the period of reading it under the 5-minute rule that we have had here. It was loaded down with amendments, and we could not do it. Congress wants to give some attention to this kind of legislation. The scoundrels seem to be very powerful in either getting a meaningless bill or no bill at all.

Mr. BLANTON. The amount that F. H. Smith & Co. and former Congressman Zihlman defrauded the people of the United States of would run up into the millions.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No doubt about that. I do not think you should put into these exceptions a provision that it shall not apply to bankers. The banker, as has been said, can take care of himself; it is the depositors that I am concerned in. I think we should strike out section (d).

If an individual in the District should sell a can of beans misbranded or sell milk contrary to the health regulations; if an individual in the District of Columbia should sell a suit of clothes as wool that is not wool or a piece of jewelry and call it sterling when it is not sterling, there are ample laws to take care of the situation; but because a man sells a piece of paper with a seal on it, which is fraudulent, he can get away with everything as long as he calls himself a banker or a broker. This bill is loaded with exceptions. That is why the bill is unsatisfactory. It has not sufficient teeth in it. Why, right in this same paragraph which leads off with an exception for bankers and financial institutions; that is, the act not being applicable to them, it goes on and excepts from the provision of the bill advertisements in newspapers and circulars, pamphlets, and other advertisements. Why, that is the very heart of any blue sky law. Why exempt such advertisement when the law to protect investors should be sufficiently far-reaching as to take any scoundrel who advertises falsely and sells securities on such misrepresentation and place him in jail where he belongs. As we read on further, I will point out similar provisions which destroy the very purpose of this bill and the purposes which I know the distinguished lady from New Jersey has in mind. Paragraph (d), to start with, should be stricken from the bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I think the committee could well accept the suggestion made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] without doing the bill any harm. I understand the general reason for this exemption is because it is patterned after similar exemptions in blue sky laws, the reason for the exemptions being that there are other laws far more stringent than the blue sky law to take care of the investment of banks. I understand that is also the case in the District of Columbia, and that this law, with the provision against banks, would not offer any greater safety to the depositors than do the existing statutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And also on page 4 in the same paragraph where it says—

> Nor to the sale of space for advertising of securities in any newspaper, magazine, or publication.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I believe one of the troubles with these bills is that always there have been too many exemptions. If we are going to draw a blue sky bill we might as well make it as broad as possible. The idea of this bill is not to protect the banks, directors of insurance companies, and so forth, but it is to protect the public which have no means of making an investigation, which it is supposed that banks and insurance companies are in the position to make.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Would banks located outside of the District be exempted from selling securities in the District under this bill?

Mr. BLACK. No; I do not think so. The point the gentleman from New York is making is that the exemption is designed to protect the banks buying securities. We are not discussing banks selling securities. I rather think that the introducer of the bill and the committee could accept the suggestions of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

A group of financial bandits, actuated by selfish motives and with no regard for the welfare of the Nation, have driven the public into a frenzy of fear and despair for no other purpose than to profit by it. Recent disclosures of the transactions on the part of men prominent in financial circles have shaken public confidence to its very foundations. When the whole story is revealed it will be the blackest page in our financial history. The curtain has been lifted just enough to enable the public to get a mere glimpse of the sordid mess. Those who have endured great financial hardship during the depression have been inclined to blame the Government, and especially Congress, for the blighting plague from which they have suffered.

The financial pirates, who have fleeced the public out of billions of dollars, now hope to obscure their iniquities by directing public attention elsewhere.

Just as soon as investigations had proceeded to a point where the financial raiders saw danger, the heavy guns of propaganda were wheeled into line for action and a broadside of vilification was turned upon Congress. The press, the magazines, the radios, the paid lecturers, and the mails have thrown down a dense smoke screen of invective to obscure and shield from public view the operations of these financial racketeers.

Thirty billions of dollars of worthless foreign bonds sold to innocent investors does not provoke widespread editorial comment. A pool to fleece the public out of millions of dollars is looked upon by the press in great financial centers as a legitimate and righteous transaction.

An organized bear raid to drive securities down to a point where thousands of banks are threatened with insolvency provokes little editorial comment and fails to arouse the indignation of the press.

The purchasing power of the United States has been deliberately and shamelessly impaired to the extent of $30,000,000,000 through the sale of worthless securities by the international bankers. Through this monumental swindle the hard-earned savings of millions of Americans have been diverted from productive enterprise at home to be spent with unrestrained prodigality abroad.

In the process of selling and unloading these worthless securities on the American public, the international bankers in some instances did know of their worthless character. It was done for the sole purpose of making unholy and unconscionable profits growing out of large and unusual commissions allowed these bankers for such sales. Much of this vast sum will be used by our foreign competitors. One foreign country has used a portion of the money obtained from the sale of its worthless securities to build better homes for its workmen and to develop parks and playgrounds for their children. The object for which the money has been spent abroad may be laudable, but in this time of distress its expenditure for those who are in need in this country would be more commendable.

A gross betrayal of our national interests such as this provokes no widespread condemnation. When Congress inserts an item in an appropriation bill to assist the States and local communities of America to train men, women, and children crippled in industry such an act is hailed as gross extravagance.

The President has recommended and Congress has passed legislation at this session of Congress to afford relief to various basic institutions of the country. Every attempt to restore public confidence has met with the organized and determined resistance of those who prey upon public distress.

Market raids have been organized and executed with consummate skill to still further shatter public confidence and for no other purpose than to frighten and bewilder their victims until in sheer desperation small investors, including employees who have purchased the stock of the company that employs them, have sacrificed their hard-earned holdings only to have them bought in by the financial vultures who hope to profit when the tide turns. This is an old racket and during previous depressions it has been carried on without let or hindrance.

The President has suggested and Congress has enacted legislative measures to absorb the shock of this world-wide depression. Never before in the history of financial panics has so much been done by the Chief Executive and by Congress through legislative enactments to reassure and restore business to its normal functions.

These efforts have been nullified by the deliberate and malicious acts of men who seek to profit by the continuation of the depression. Every manifestation of a return of confidence has been met with ruthless resistance and a bold counterattack upon security values.

The time will come, however, when the testimony now spread upon the record will become known to the public and the motive for the vicious attacks that have been launched upon Congress will be disclosed.

Mr. EVANS of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask this privilege for the purpose of presenting to the House a distinguished young woman of this country. She is a resident of the city which I have the honor to represent in part—Los Angeles. On Saturday evening she won the national championship in the oratorical contest held in this city on the fundamentals of the Constitution of the United States. In a short time she will compete for the world championship. She is in the gallery this afternoon, and I take great pleasure in presenting to the House Miss Lucylle Goldsmith, of Los Angeles. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon section 1 and all amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. I call the gentleman's attention to page 2 of the bill. It provides that—

Salesmen shall include every person employed or appointed or authorized by a dealer to sell or to offer for sale within the District of Columbia, for a commission or compensation, any security to any person.

The subsection then proceeds with the definition of partners and partnerships, and so forth. Then we find in subsection (b) that—

The term "include," when used in the definition contained in this act, shall not be deemed to exclude other things or persons otherwise within the meaning of the term "define."

In subsection (c) the law specifically provides:

The provisions of this act shall not apply to any receiver, referee, administrator, executor, guardian, or other person appointed or acting under the judgment or order of any court—

And so forth.

And subsection (d) provides:

The provisions of this act shall not apply to any sale or offer for sale of securities to any bank, banker, savings bank, etc., trust company, building and loan association.

I think the gentleman from New York will understand definitely that it is necessary to prescribe certain limitations around the qualification for salesmen, and consequently there are excluded from the bill receiverships and referees, administrators, bankers, and so forth.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWMAN. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, "receivers" is not in this paragraph, so that is out of the argument. I am talking about section (b) alone. Now, this act provides, first—

Shall not apply to bankers—

But what I can not understand is why in the same paragraph there should be added the provision:

nor to the sale of space for advertising of securities in any newspaper, magazine, or publication, nor to the offering of securities by any person in conjunction with any registered dealer by use of advertisement.

That is where all the vice and trouble come.

Mr. BOWMAN. That section applies only to bankers, trust companies, and so forth.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. It reads:

The provisions of this act shall not apply.

That is what I wanted to strike out. It will not hurt the law at all to strike out paragraph (d). Unless the bankers sell they will not come into it, but this vicious part which has been unwittingly hooked on to paragraph (d) is the root of the evil. Nothing will be accomplished unless that goes out. I can not do anything more than offer the amendment and call the attention of the House to it.

Mr. BOWMAN. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWMAN. I yield.

Mr. MILLARD. This bill was framed after similar laws in the States of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, was it not?

Mr. BOWMAN. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. MILLARD. Is this same provision contained in those laws?

Mr. BOWMAN. Yes. It is also in the Connecticut and the New Jersey laws.

Mr. MILLARD. The New York law is a very carefully worded law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from New York moved to strike out the entire paragraph, namely, (d). There is a committee amendment to strike out lines 7 and 8, and I take it that the vote will first come on the committee amendment, in the nature of a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee amendment will be acted on first.

The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 4, line 6, after the word "groups" and the semicolon, strike out the words "nor to any sale or offer for sale of securities upon the floor of any exchange to a dealer in securities."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOWMAN) there were ayes 22 and noes 6.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 4, line 16, insert a new section to read as follows:

"(e) It shall not be necessary for incorporated banks, including national banks and trust companies, now or hereafter transacting business as banks and/or trust companies within the District of Columbia, and subject to examination and supervision by the Comptroller of the Currency of the United States, to register or to file any registration as required in section 2 of this act, nor shall it be necessary for any such bank or trust company to pay the fee or to file any supplemental registration statement as required in section 4 of this act, but such banks and trust companies shall in all other respects be subject to the provisions of this act."

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I regret that the distinguished gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] has charged my colleague from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] with filibustering. Mr. BLANTON was a member of this committee for many years. He is familiar with the legislation that has been pending for many years before this committee. He can find the loopholes and jokers in a bill as quick as any Member of this body. He is one of the most useful Members of the House of Representatives. He has the interest of the people at heart, and his knowledge of parliamentary law enables him to very effectively protect and defend them from innocuous proposals such as the one now pending before us. His participation in this debate has been very helpful. I am glad that he refuses to be intimidated by such unjustified charges, and continues to carry on for what he believes is right.

Since the LaGuardia amendment, striking out section (d) has been adopted, this committee amendment inserting section (e) should be defeated. If it is intended to apply to those concerns named in section (d), section (e) should not be in the bill. I hope the chairman of the committee will agree with me on that proposition, and accept my amendment.

While the committee chairman is examining the amendment I want to invite attention to the fact that I do not think this bill should pass in any form. If the bill does pass, it will just be a hindrance. It will be an excuse for not enacting real legislation. This is not effective legislation against fraud. If it were, you would be for it and I would be for it. All of us would be in favor of enacting legislation against fraud. We want to stop fraud. We want to put people who are guilty of fraud in the penitentiary, but this bill will not do it. It will be a hindrance rather than a help. For instance, in the case of the F. H. Smith Co., those men who were guilty of violating the law have been sent to the penitentiary. Under this bill they would have been registered to sell securities, and then, after they had defrauded people, instead of having a grand-jury indictment, they would have been investigated by the Department of Insurance to determine whether or not they were guilty.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the proposed section (e) such fraudulent outfits as the F. H. Smith Co. could sell all sorts of worthless securities in the 48 States without even filing them for registration or having any action taken whatever regarding investigation of their value.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Or the American Bond & Mortgage Co.?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. This provision would permit more fraud than exists to-day.

Mr. PATMAN. I think it would be an excuse for fraud. If this bill were enacted into law, a salesman would call at your office. His argument would be this:

I am registered under the laws of the District of Columbia to sell securities. In order to sell these securities I must submit to the District insurance commissioner all the advertising that I am putting out. I have submitted to him all this advertising. He has put his stamp of approval upon it, and, therefore, you can rely upon every word that is stated in this advertising matter, and I should not be registered here unless I were selling good securities.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. Would not that same argument apply to any effort at the regulation of the sale of securities, or if we tried to control the security or the man who sold the security, and is it not true there is nothing in this bill that repeals any criminal statute that the F. H. Smith Co. or any other company may have violated?

Mr. PATMAN. If this bill had been effective when the F. H. Smith Co. was selling these worthless securities what would have happened? Complaint would have been made. Instead of making complaint to the grand jury, as was done in that case, complaint would be made to the insurance commissioner, who would have spent one month, two months, six months, or two years investigating it, and then if the statute of limitations had run upon the criminal offense that had been committed, of course, it would be just too bad for the law-abiding people of the District.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. There certainly is not a thing in the bill that in any way affects the action of the prosecuting official of the District.

Mr. PATMAN. It does not enjoin him. Do not take too much of my time. It would give the commissioner of insurance jurisdiction.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 17, noes 13.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of section 1 and insert in lieu thereof the provisions of the bill known as the Blaine blue sky bill, S. 3362, after the enacting clause. That is a real blue sky bill which will stop fraud all over the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I give notice that if the Blaine bill is inserted as an amendment, I shall move to strike out the other provisions of the House bill, which notice I am entitled to give under the rules of the House.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order and ask unanimous consent that the reading of a long bill like the Blaine bill be dispensed with. We all know what it is.

Mr. BLANTON. This is one of the best bills that have yet been proposed. While it, too, needs amending, I want the membership to hear it.

Mr. BLACK. It is just taking up the time of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLANTON: Strike out all of section 1 of H. R. 9065 and insert in lieu thereof the following, after the enacting clause:

"DEFINITIONS

"SECTION 1. When used in this act the following terms shall, unless the text otherwise indicates, have the following respective meanings:

"(1) 'Security' shall include any note, stock, treasury stock, bonds, debenture, evidence of indebtedness, certificate of interest or participation, or right to subscribe to any of the foregoing, certificates of interest in a profit-sharing agreement, certificate of interest in an oil, gas, or mining lease, collateral trust certificate, preorganization certificate, preorganization subscription, any transferable share, investment contract, or beneficial interest in title to property, profits or earnings, or any other instrument commonly known as a security, including an interim or temporary bond, debenture, note, certificate, or receipt for a security or for subscription to a security.

"(2) 'Person' shall include a natural person, a corporation created under the laws of the United States, District of Columbia, or any State, country, sovereignty, or political subdivision thereof, a partnership, an association, a joint-stock company, a trust, and any unincorporated organization. As used herein the term 'trust' shall not include a trust created or appointed under or by virtue of a last will and testament, or by a court of law or equity, or any public charitable trust.

"(3) 'Sale' or 'sell' shall include every disposition, or attempt to dispose of a security or interest in a security for value. Any security given or delivered with, or as a bonus on account of, any purchase of securities or any other thing, shall be conclusively presumed to constitute a part of the subject of such purchase and to have been sold for value. 'Sale' or 'sell' shall also include a contract to sell, an exchange, an attempt to sell, an option of sale, a solicitation of a sale, a subscription or an offer to sell, directly or by an agent, or a circular, letter, advertisement, or otherwise: Provided, That a privilege pertaining to a security giving the holder the privilege to convert such security into another security of the same issuer shall not be deemed a sale of such other security within the meaning of this definition and such privilege shall not be construed as affecting the status of the security to which such privilege pertains with respect to exemption or registration under the provisions of this act, but when such privilege of conversion shall be exercised such conversion shall be subject to the limitations hereinafter provided in subsection (h) of section 5: And provided further, That the issue or transfer of a right pertaining to a security and entitling the holder of such right to subscribe to another security of the same issuer, when such right is issued or transferred with the security to which it pertains, shall not be deemed a sale of such other security within the meaning of this definition and such right shall not be construed as affecting the status of the security to which such right pertains with respect to exemption or registration under the provisions of this act; but the sale of such other security upon the exercise of such right shall be subject to the provisions of this act."

Mrs. NORTON (interrupting the reading of the amendment). Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. THOMASON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9065) to supervise and regulate the sale of securities within the District of Columbia, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MCCLINTIC of Oklahoma (at the request of Mr. HASTINGS), for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. BOYLAN, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. GOODWIN, indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. KENDALL (at the request of Mr. KURTZ), indefinitely, on account of the death of his brother.

To Mr. HARE (at the request of Mr. DOMINICK), for two days, on account of important business.

OPENING AND CLOSING OF ROADS ON LANDS OWNED BY THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA AT OCCOQUAN, VA.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 1768) to provide for the opening and closing of roads within the boundaries of the District of Columbia workhouse property at Occoquan, Fairfax County, Va., and ask unanimous consent for its consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The lady from New Jersey calls up Senate bill 1768, to provide for the opening and closing of roads within the boundaries of the District of Columbia workhouse property at Occoquan, Fairfax County, Va., and asks unanimous consent for its consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there was a bill before the committee called up in the House, and the House went into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider it, and under the 5-minute rule it was being read when I offered a germane amendment. During the reading of the amendment, without concluding it, the committee rose.

I wish to propound a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not the unfinished business of the committee to finish reading that amendment before it takes up any other bill?

The SPEAKER. It was in the committee; but the committee rose, and we are now in the House.

Mr. BLANTON. That is a bill upon which there had been general debate and it was being read under the 5-minute rule. An amendment had been offered to substitute a Senate bill and notice was given that if the amendment were adopted and the Senate bill substituted motions would be made striking out the following provisions of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas that the Committee of the Whole rose. When the Committee of the Whole resumes consideration of that particular bill it will then resume consideration of the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I think it is more important to finish the other bill, and I therefore object.

BOARD OF INDETERMINATE SENTENCE AND PAROLE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill H. R. 10273, a bill to establish a board of indeterminate sentence and parole for the District of Columbia and to determine its functions, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10273.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, before the Chair puts that motion can we arrive at some limit of time for general debate on this bill?

Mrs. NORTON. Thirty minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think we can arrive at any such agreement.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn. It seems we can not get anywhere. The gentleman from Texas will not agree to anything.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Maryland will not agree to anything. I am not going to allow him to thus refer to me on the floor.

The SPEAKER. All of this discussion is out of order.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this bill be limited to 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The lady from New Jersey moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10273, and, pending that motion, asks unanimous consent that debate on the bill be limited to 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADJOURNMENT

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Will the lady withhold that motion for a minute?

Mrs. NORTON. Gladly.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask something about the program for to-morrow and the balance of the week?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that two election cases will be taken up-tomorrow.

Mr. SNELL. They will take very little time, because I understand they are unanimous reports. Is anything else to come up?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not been advised about it. The Chair understood there was to be some debate on one of the election cases but probably not. When consideration of those cases is finished it is possible that the bill which is to be taken up for consideration Thursday may be taken up, a bill reported by the Banking and Currency Committee—either that or the House will adjourn.

PLEA FOR ADDITIONAL DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA LEGISLATION

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask the lady from New Jersey not to insist on her motion to adjourn because we have two bills from the District Committee which are vitally important to the District and vitally important in the way of employment. We have two bills which permit the closing of streets and the extension of a railroad spur at Buzzards Point for the purpose of the erection of a new power plant. It is estimated that about $4,000,000 will be spent in the District by the erection of this plant. If these bills are passed, they must be passed to-day if they are to serve their purpose. I understand we will not have another District day in the House. I hope therefore this House will not adjourn without giving this opportunity of relief through the expenditure of money for construction work. This is the first light I have seen in the way of relieving unemployment and it means a great deal to the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a quorum. I think we should have one.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the lady withhold her motion?

Mrs. NORTON. I will be glad to withhold it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas withhold his point of no quorum?

Mr. BLANTON. For the purpose of permitting the gentleman from Alabama to make a statement; yes.

CHARLES BRANTLEY AYCOCK

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, on last Friday, May 20, the statue of the late Charles Brantley Aycock, one of America's outstanding statesmen, was presented to the United States. The presentation was made by the governor, representing the State of North Carolina, and by the Hon. Josephus Daniels, former Secretary of the Navy, representing the Aycock Statue Commission of North Carolina.

It was my privilege to attend and hear a part of that very interesting program in Statuary Hall. Unfortunately, I did not hear nor have I a copy of the address of the Hon. Josephus Daniels, but I understand the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LAMBETH] has a copy and will ask permission to extend his remarks by inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the very able address of Mr. Daniels. I have a copy of the masterful address of the Hon. Max Gardner, who is one of America's greatest executives and who truly represents all of the fine traditions of the Old North State. The address accepting for the United States the Aycock statue was delivered by our colleague the Hon. LINDSAY C. WARREN, who so ably represents the first congressional district of North Carolina in the House of Representatives. Mr. WARREN'S address, a copy of which I also have, is a classic, worthy of his fine intellectual genius. I ask permission of the House to have these addresses printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The addresses follow:

ADDRESS OF GOVERNOR GARDNER PRESENTING THE AYCOCK STATUE, STATUARY HALL, WASHINGTON, D. C., FRIDAY, MAY 20, 1932, AT 3 O'CLOCK P. M.

In Westminster Abbey there is a tablet to the memory of a great son of Britain which bears only two words, "Loved, served."

These two words, with great appropriateness, could be carved on this statue of Aycock.

In the undelivered speech of Charles Brantley Aycock, announcing his candidacy for the United States Senate, there is a sentence which seeks a self-appraisal that will be universally accepted by the public and will relieve contemporary North Carolinians of all embarrassment in the invidious task of selecting him for this great national honor.

Mr. Aycock had set a date for his formal announcement of his candidacy for the Senate, but meanwhile had been called to Birmingham to address the National Education Association. There standing before the teachers of his country and glorifying their cause, he fell dead on the platform with "education" as his last audible word. There was a predestined fitness in his death as there had been in that life, for despite his rearing in the sweltering domain of politics he wrought his immortality in his ministry to the child.

In that unuttered address Governor Aycock wrote of himself: "For I am a plain and simple man who loves his friends and has never been hated enough by any man to make him hate again in return." You see in a moment why North Carolina's devotion perseveres after an interim of 30 years between his public service in office and this good day. "A plain and simple man who loved his friends" and never allowed the hate of an enemy to change the direction of his duty. What a sublime philosophy of life.

Most of our great public men have been victimized by both their enemies and their friends. If friends have not disproportioned our heroes utterly by praise, enemies have deformed them by calumny. To see only the faults or to see no faults at all has been the tragic limitation of this great democracy of ours. And then finally comes a day when this great whirling chaos turns to order, justifies itself and the faith of all its dreamers, canonizes a man like Charles Brantley Aycock, and in one voice demands that he be placed in the Valhalla of the Nation.

I do not anticipate any development in our national life which can alter the verdict of our times. Choosing for Statuary Hall a second North Carolinian to embody in bronze the spirit of our people and the genius of our institutions could have been both an audacious and an impudent performance. It has a finality about it that is subject to all the discounts of history. But I dare say that if there ever comes a time when North Carolinians repudiate the decision of our own day, the Commonwealth itself will have degenerated so that it will be interested in no great past, without which interest there can be no great future.

Two of our greatest sons have been honored by other States. Andrew Jackson is presented by Tennessee and Thomas Hart Benton by Missouri. They pioneered in the westward sweep of the empire, leaving behind an equally mighty array of figures to pioneer in the spirit of democracy—William Richardson Davie, the "father of the university," governor, diplomat, Senator; Nathaniel Macon, fundamental democrat and prince of the parliamentarians as Speaker of the National House of Representatives; James Knox Polk, President of the United States, who added the vast empires of Texas and California to the great Republic; Archibald D. Murphy, deep scholar and constructive planner of North Carolina's development; Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, defender of the Constitution, and glorified exponent of the right of mankind to be redeemed by their own crafts; Thomas Ruffin and Richmond Pearson, who made their own bar and bench known throughout the country; Walter Hines Page, editor, scholar, social and educational reformer, internationally famous ambassador to the Court of St. James; not to mention Willie P. Mangum, William Gaston, William A. Graham, John Motley Morehead, James Johnston Pettigrew, and a hundred others of a great line. What a galaxy of stars from which to find our contribution to the Nation.

North Carolina's choice has fallen upon men close to our own time—Vance and Aycock—men whose personality and traits are still familiar to many now living. Neither won the highest prizes of public office in the Nation—Presidency, Vice Presidency, or Cabinet officer. But each loved his way into this national eminence and won his place on their universal recognition as typical products of North Carolina at its best.

Yet all of us recognize that this distinction, admirable and enviable as it may be, is of itself not sufficient to warrant inclusion in the national pantheon. We must look for that elusive, almost indefinable, quality which the world calls greatness. The term is loosely used and bestowed often where it does not belong. These men were North Carolina politicians, and in the world-wide debunking, it has become a fashion to make politics a byword and a hissing. Neither Vance nor Aycock regarded himself better or worse than his fellows, and they in turn knew that the difference between these statesmen and themselves was their unwillingness to flatter, to cringe, to crawl, to time serve, to gain power and applause by pandering to the mistakes, the prejudices, and the passions of the uninformed multitude.

In a régime beginning in the fury of a "white-supremacy" campaign, who will ever forget Aycock, standing in the State convention and called to account by the critics of his administration? Yet he stood there before a mighty throng of his own people and told them that a Commonwealth could be neither great nor good at heart if it supported that monstrous doctrine that ignorance can be a cure for anything. Standing before his great mind there was not merely the white child, there was the child race to be taught. And never since that day, 28 years ago, has universal education been seriously challenged or interrupted in North Carolina. He never lost his partisan fervor; he never abated a jot or tittle his love for the democracy whose virtues he extolled with incomparable eloquence. Yet he won the respect, the admiration, the love of his political opponents.

North Carolina gratefully presents him to the whole people today as a North Carolina product unchanged or unspoiled by exotic growth. He was a "tar heel" to the toes. Other public men in our State have had a broader but not a deeper culture. His Shakespeare, his Tennyson, and his Bible gave him a style that fascinated any audience anywhere in the country. New York cheered him and Boston marveled at the rhythmic oratory of a countryman who did his utmost to be unadorned in speech or dress. But it was his love that made him eloquent, and Boston warmed to him with the fervor of Black Swamp in Wayne County.

Had Charles B. Aycock reached the United States Senate he never would have regarded himself a United States Senator, but rather an ambassador from the country of North Carolina to the court of Washington. Yet his colleagues never would have called him a provincialist, for none knew better than he that North Carolina was in the world and of it. His was a love that began at Jerusalem, spread to Samaria, and then to the uttermost parts of the earth. He conceived his first duty as a citizen to set himself aright. He sought first the "kingdom and its righteousness," and the Nation had been added unto him.

This explains how to-day it comes that we are gathered in this sanctuary of statesmanship to unveil this monument to him. Geographical theaters do not restrict him, public office does not remind us constantly of him. Shakespeare makes one of his characters exclaim, "So shines a good deed in a naughty world," but in Charles Brantley Aycock we behold the good deed shining in a society organized to radiate his influence and power throughout the Nation.

North Carolina lovingly presents him to the country as a leader of men, who, in his small territory, was too great to praise prejudice as patriotism, to call ignorance wisdom, or to make flattery the test of real friendship for his people. He saw his beloved State struggling up out of "poverty and ignorance and long repression into knowledge and general power." Some of us gave startling statistics on the lowliness of our position, others lamented our grinding poverty, still others bemoaned the depth of our illiteracy. But Charles B. Aycock rose to dispel them. He could tell his people that they were poor without patronizing them, that they were illiterate without deriding them, that they were lazy without abusing them. Others coming after him have reaped where he sowed, and have sowed in soil made fertile by his life.

It was the great Pasteur who defined democracy as "that order in the State which enables every man or woman to put forth his or her utmost effort." Such was the passion of Aycock that 3,000,000 of his North Carolina people to-day have a larger and a richer life because he was democracy personified, democracy in action.

North Carolina joyfully presents him to his country, not as the expounder of a form of government, but as the product and fruit of its spirit. We acclaim him in North Carolina, white and black, and love him because he first loved them.

ADDRESS OF REPRESENTATIVE LINDSAY C. WARREN, OF NORTH CAROLINA, ACCEPTING THE STATUE OF CHARLES BRANTLEY AYCOCK IN STATUARY HALL, MAY 20, 1932, AT 3 P. M.

Surveying a brilliant field of stars of the first magnitude, appraising those who had best served her and the Nation throughout her long and great and honorable history, North Carolina, with a unanimity of opinion, brings here to-day as the companion of the immortal Vance the well-carved image of one whose title is the most deserving, whose fame is the most secure, and whose right to stand in the Nation's Pantheon will never cause the justness of the award to be challenged.

Here amongst the memorials of her good and great—of her best and highest, our State presents the likeness of one whose works and deeds have made him worthy to bear witness to all time of what our country holds to be highest and noblest in her citizens and her servants, and provides for its citizens in him a lasting sense of individual inspiration and of national life.

While this statue may speak of the past, it also has a greater meaning to the present and future. Valuable as was his contribution to his day and generation, it will prove incomparably more valuable on down through the ages, and beyond the calculable values of his life and works, there is also an infinite inspiration like a spring of water never ceasing, of which everyone who pauses here in all the time to come may drink, and for the drinking will be the better in every aspect of life.

When Charles Brantley Aycock heard the cry of his people and saw the perils of his government, he threw the whole weight of his great mentality, his indomitable spirit, and his majestic courage into the struggle. By the sheer power of his personality, by the force and eloquence of his logic, by the all-pervading sincerity and sweetness and simplicity of his soul—speaking a language all could understand—he led a revolution that gave his people a rebirth, and laid securely the foundation of the new order that has carried the State to the highest peaks of her sisterhood in the Nation.

In a time more distressful than the present, and out of disaster more dark then any that now threatens or may ever threaten us, there arose his great figure in the Commonwealth of North Carolina—a figure of the infinite riches of the spiritual values in a time of poverty—a figure of faith in a time of despair—a figure of courage in a time of fear—and in that figure the Commonwealth found the symbol of her will, the deliverer of her rights, and the vindicator of her ideals. He was born of the travail of her soul—of the travail of the War between the States, and the travail of her struggle for the preservation of her institutions, and it may reverently be said of North Carolina that in him she saw of the travail of her soul and was satisfied.

The distinction of Charles Brantley Aycock is twofold. He gave to North Carolina the leadership which brought with it the right of those fitted by the centuries with the capacity to govern and to determine the destiny of the State, and at the same time to execute judgment in righteousness in regard to a numerous people whose activity in political matters stood in the way of that destiny. He gave to North Carolina also the leadership which established popular education as the foremost interest of his Commonwealth and brought to every boy and girl in the State the privilege and opportunity of a great system of public schools.

This statue will long abide, but his fame will outlast the bronze, and the impression of his deeds will survive so long as civilization itself shall be the goal of human endeavor.

Mr. Chairman, with the pride of his Commonwealth and the gratitude of his country, I accept, in behalf of the United States, this statue of North Carolina's noble son, Charles Brantley Aycock.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have five legislative days within which to extend their own remarks on the bill considered in the House to-day under a motion to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, for to-day I shall object.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks made to-day in the RECORD.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I regret it, but in order to keep the RECORD clear, there was only 10 minutes' debate and no one could have time generally. With all due courtesy to everyone I think we should keep the RECORD straight and that there should be no extensions of remarks to-day. I object, Mr. Speaker.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. May the Chair ask a question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]? The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] inquired of the Chair what would probably be considered to-morrow in case consideration of the two election contests was concluded at a very early time, it being thought that each case would only require a few minutes. The Chair was unable to inform the gentleman but rather expressed the hope or, perhaps, the opinion that the Steagall guaranty of deposits bill would be taken up. The Chair was not sure about that and would like the gentleman from Illinois to inform the House, if he can, just what will be considered at that time.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] has advised me he would like to take his bill up Thursday next, and stated it would probably require two days and he did not want its consideration interrupted with any other business.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, could we not have general debate on that bill to-morrow and then start reading the bill for amendment on Thursday? I think this would be ideal. It is the most important and most interesting piece of legislation we have had in this Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can determine that to-morrow.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois when he expects to arrange for another meeting to consider bills on the Private Calendar?

Mr. RAINEY. Next Friday evening.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I renew my point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Evidently, there is not a quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 24, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

7877. By Mr. BOYLAN: Resolution adopted at the convention of the New York City Federation of Women's Clubs, New York City, opposing the principle of levying any such additional tax which would act as an obstacle to the functioning of a free and open market for securities, etc.; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7878. Also, letter from the Fifth Avenue Association, New York City, N. Y., favoring a repeal of the eighteenth amendment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

7879. Also, letter from the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, favoring House bill 7726, providing for the immediate payment of the adjusted-service certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7880. Also, letter from the Labor's National Committee for Modification of the Volstead Act, favoring the O'Connor-Hull beer bill; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

7881. Also, resolution adopted by the Uniformed Firemen's Association of New York City, N. Y., petitioning the Congress of the United States to take action by voting a Federal bond issue of at least $5,000,000,000 to finance construction of public works and other undertakings which will provide employment for many idle men and point toward the Nation's economic recovery; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7882. By Mr. BRUNNER: Resolution of the volunteer committee for aid of the unemployed of Richmond Hill, N. Y., opposing any reduction in the salaries of Federal employees; also resolution urging repeal of the Volstead law and urging Congress to order a wholesale investigation of the bank accounts of all Members of House and Senate who are favoring prohibition, and so forth; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7883. By Mr. CRAIL: Petition of W. H. Schock and many citizens of Los Angeles, Calif., urging Congress to end national prohibition, legalize liquor, and levy a tax on it; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

7884. Also, petition of board of directors of the Burbank Chamber of Commerce, Burbank, Calif., requesting Congress to enact legislation to regulate the hauling by trucks and busses of freight and passengers so as to protect the public; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

7885. Also, petition of Corabelle Sill and other ladies of Los Angeles, Calif., urging Congress to do all in its power to get legislation that will make possible Federal relief of the unemployed, and a construction program by the Federal Government that will put people to work; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7886. Also, petition of Central Labor Council of Los Angeles, Calif., urging favorable action on the proposed $5,000,000,000 bond loan; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7887. Also, petition of Women's Law Observance Association of Los Angeles, Calif., opposing a referendum on the eighteenth amendment and favoring adequate appropriations for law enforcement and education in law observance; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

7888. By Mr. CULLEN: Petition of the New York City Federation of Women's Clubs, opposing a tax which would act as an obstacle to the functioning of a free and open market for securities; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7889. Also, petition of the Railway Electric Supply Manufacturers' Association, urging that regulation of the railroads be restricted and limited to the interests of public welfare only, and that all forms of competing transportation be regulated and taxed to the same degree; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

7890. By Mr. GILCHRIST: Petition of J. A. Chambers, of Ralston, Iowa, and 22 citizens of that vicinity, urging maintenance of existing prohibition enforcement laws and activities and protesting any change; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

7891. By Mr. HADLEY: Resolution in the nature of a petition of the Board of County Commissioners of Snohomish County, Wash., urging an appropriation by Congress for the purchase of certain county warrants or bonds; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

7892. By Mr. LINDSAY: Petition of the Railway Electric Supply Manufacturers' Association, Chicago, urging that regulation of the railroads be restricted and limited to the interests of the public welfare only and that all forms of competing transportation be regulated and taxed to the same degree; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

7893. Also, petition of Labor's National Committee for Modification of the Volstead Act, Washington, D. C., urging passage of the O'Connor-Hull beer bill; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

7894. Also, petition of Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, urging the passage of House bill 7726, providing for immediate payment of the adjusted-service certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7895. Also, petition of New York City Federation of Women's Clubs (Inc.), opposing tax on American securities; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7896. Also, petition of the National Retail Hardware Association, Indianapolis, urging the reduction of Federal expenditures; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7897. Also, petition of the city of Chicago, by direction of the city council, requesting that provision be made for an increase in our money supply to restore in the United States the average wholesale commodity price level of the year 1926; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

7898. Also, petition of the Uniformed Firemen's Association of Greater New York, favoring the voting of a Federal bond issue of at least $5,000,000,000 to finance construction of public works and other undertakings which will provide work for the unemployed; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

7899. By Mr. LONERGAN: Petition of a group of business men and citizens of the city of New Britain; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7900. By Mr. MEAD: Petition of patternmakers of Pittsburg, regarding salary reductions; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7901. Also petition of Plasterers Local Union, No. 31, regarding salary reductions; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7902. Also, petition of New York City Federation of Women's Clubs (Inc.), opposing additional tax; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7903. Also, petition of Painters Local Union, No. 458, regarding salary reductions; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7904. By Mr. PARKER of Georgia: Petition of C. R. Waites and 92 other citizens of Savannah, Ga., urging the passage of railroad pension bill, H. R. 9891 and S. 4646; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

7905. By Mr. RUDD: Petition of United States Building and Loan League, favoring the passage of the home loan bank bill; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

7906. Also, petition of Labor's National Committee for Modification of the Volstead Act, favoring the discharge of the Committee on Ways and Means of the O'Connor-Hull beer bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7907. Also, petition of the Fifth Avenue Association, New York City, favoring the modification of the Volstead Act first and then the repeal of the eighteenth amendment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

7908. Also, petition of New York City Federation of Womens Clubs (Inc.), opposing additional tax on securities; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7909. By Mr. SABATH: Petition adopted by Chicago City Council, favoring increase of the money supply for the purpose of restoring the prices of commodities to the level of the year 1926; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

7910. By Mr. SCHUETZ: Petition of the Cook County Council, the American Legion, Department of Illinois, resolving that immediate steps should be taken by the American Legion during present session of Congress to endeavor to have the law amended so as to extend the conversion date of the 5-year convertible term policy five years or more, or until 1937; to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

7911. Also, petition of the Cook County Council, the American Legion, Department of Illinois, protesting against reduction of personnel of the Naval Reserve and the discontinuance of the naval cruises; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

7912. Also, petition of the City Council of the City of Chicago, recommending a Federal bond issue for public improvements; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7929. Also, petition of 50 citizens of Westmoreland County, Pa., protesting against the bill singling out automotive products for taxation, and urging instead some form of general tax to be used to raise the necessary revenue; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE

TUESDAY, MAY 24, 1932

(Legislative day of Monday, May 9, 1932)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

TARIFF ON COPPER

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I submit my factual summary of the exhibits supporting the tariff on copper. This information should be available to the conferees. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the summary was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fact No. 1. In 1883 copper metal was protected by a rate of 4 cents per pound. Copper has been upon the free list since 1894. No protection was sought when the Hawley-Smoot bill was enacted because domestic copper at that time could still hold its own with foreign competition. But conditions have dominantly changed in the last three years. I do not refer to the general economic depression, from which, of course, copper has not been immune, but from which copper has been a major sufferer. I do not refer to transient economic infirmities due to fluctuating international exchange, although here again copper has been a major victim. I specifically refer to a permanent change in the world-wide copper situation which brings unlimited new foreign deposits of high-grade ore into production upon a scale which literally swamps the copper markets of the earth. This is the new menace which completely differentiates the present copper crisis from any jeopardy ever heretofore confronted. This is the new menace which differentiates the copper crisis from all other commodity hazards. It is a permanent menace. Recurrent prosperity can not overtake it. It can be met only by tariff differentials. Copper is on the free list. It therefore can not be served by the United States Tariff Commission through its flexible powers. It can only be served as the pending amendment proposes. It is this or nothing.

Fact No. 2. Other countries do not hesitate to protect their copper. Why should we? There are copper tariffs in 26 of the leading countries of the world. Some of our chief competitors for the copper trade of the world build up their copper industry behind a protective wall. From behind this wall they invade the United States. From behind this wall they go out to meet us in quest of neutral markets. There is no right of complaint anywhere on earth if we finally come to a kindred interest in the defense and sustenance of our own American copper and its primary right to first purchase in our own American market. For 38 years we have given the world the privilege of free competition in this market, when we often had no such reciprocal right elsewhere. Thirty-eight years is long enough. We are entitled, by every rule of right and of self-preservation, now to look after our own.

Fact No. 3. Once upon a time we were copper exporters. Now we are net importers. No agile homiletics can disguise this fact. We began to be net importers, in both copper and copper manufactures in 1929. Mark the date. It bears upon my previous statement that copper conditions in the world have totally changed since the Smoot-Hawley bill was enacted. Our exports, excluding manufactures, declined from a peak of 504,000 short tons in 1928 to 236,000 tons in 1931. Our exports, including manufactures, declined from a peak of 552,000 tons in 1928 to 272,000 tons in 1931. Each succeeding year showed a serial decrease in exports until 1931, and each succeeding year showed a serial increase in imports until 1931. But that is not all. These malignant progressions are now sweeping ahead at frightful speed. Based upon the three months from December, 1931, to February, 1932, the annual prorated copper export, exclusive of manufactures, has fallen to 157,000 tons. Including manufactures, it has fallen to 193,000 tons. Meanwhile the imports have risen to 428,000 tons. I beg of the Senate to conjure this figure. Four hundred and twenty-eight thousand tons coming in. Much less than half going out. The former figure persistently increasing. The latter figure persistently decreasing. He who runs may read. Domestic copper is doomed unless this Congress gives it some lease on life.

Fact No. 4. Once upon a time a dozen American States dominated the copper production of the world. Now these domestic operators are at the utter mercy of a rising copper tide on at least three continents. Whether this copper actually invades the American market or not—and much of it does—all of it rolls into the international market place and grinds the American production out of successful competition. The foreign production of new copper has risen from 242,000 tons in 1900 and 411,000 tons in 1910 and 709,000 tons in 1925 to 1,039,000 tons in 1930—with the tremendous new African production yet to make a major contribution. The American production, which was 303,000 tons in 1900 and 540,000 tons in 1910 and 837,000 tons in 1925, was down to 697,000 tons in 1930—and much lower since. But note the monitory sweep in these authenticated figures: Foreign production, from 44 per cent of the world's supply in 1900 to 60 per cent in 1930, and rapidly going up; American production, from 56 per cent in 1900 down to 40 per cent in 1930, and rapidly going lower. The foreign production capacity at the end of 1932 is set at 1,618,000 tons. Mark you: This is more than the whole world's copper consumption in 1930—very much more than the world's total consumption prospectively in 1932. Is it not obvious that American copper confronts new conditions without precedent? Is it not plain that these conditions involve permanent hazard which nothing but a tariff differential can offset?

Fact No. 5. For the 31-year period from 1900 to 1930 the average selling price of copper was approximately 15.9 cents per pound. Even excluding the war period, the average was 14.8 cents per pound. In 1931 the price averaged a trifle over 8 cents per pound. Copper now sells in the neighborhood of 6 cents. It can be sold at 6 cents in the United States from many of these foreign properties and actually net a profit. It can not thus be sold from the great mass of American copper properties. The reason will presently appear. It is the price itself which stands out as the devastating fact No. 5—a price which reflects not only the generally lowered commodity index but a price which particularly reflects this new and permanent flood of cheap foreign competition—a price which reflects the permanent ruin of the domestic mines. If all of the proposed 4-cent duty were to be added to the American price, it would be only 11 cents, which is far below the normal average. But a 4-cent rate is not an embargo rate. Furthermore, there are large surplus stocks above ground. The full tariff will not be reflected in the price. The full protection of American copper would justify a rate of 9 or 10 cents. We ask but half of this consideration. We are justified by both mathematics and fair play.

Fact No. 6. The reason why foreign copper can rob domestic copper of its home market is the fact that foreign ore is inherently richer—the average copper content of domestic ore being about 1.6 per cent as compared with from 4 to 6 per cent elsewhere—and the still more vital fact that foreign production costs are substantially lower than our own. These operating costs vary both at home and abroad in different properties. We must deal in averages. When the United States Tariff Commission reported comprehensively upon these costs, it did not have the benefit of full figures upon the new African developments. Yet it frankly disclosed a dangerous differential. Other and additional figures are now available. The Frood mine of the International Nickel Co. of Canada shows an operating cost of 3.18 cents per pound. Additional financial charges at the figure reported by the Tariff Commission shows a total cost of 6.57 cents per pound. In Katanga, in Africa, the actual costs are frankly concealed even from stockholders, because the president of the corporation candidly tells them it isn't wise to let the world know how low these costs are. In Rhodesia the best information shows an operating cost of 5.3 cents per pound. Labor in Katanga—native black labor—runs from 5½ to 34¾ cents per day. Labor in Rhodesia runs from 35 cents to 75 cents, with all charges included. These are the elements against which our American mines and our American miners are asked to contend.

Using the commission's figures as a basis, there has been developed a comparison of average costs which shows the adjusted average foreign costs to be 8.07 cents per pound, which, compared with the commission's figure of 13.29 cents per pound for the United States, gives a difference of 5.22 cents per pound. Hence the proposed 4-cent tariff rate.

Fact No. 7. The Tariff Commission shows that 40 per cent of domestic production costs over 14 cents a pound. It is obvious that the proposed tariff can not save all of our domestic production. It is equally obvious that it will not shut out all foreign copper; first, because copper is a by-product in some of these alien properties and will be sold without regard to cost; second, because a substantial portion of the foreign copper is produced under quasi-governmental control in connection with colonization policies and will be marketed for less than cost of production if necessary; third, because even a slight raise in the American price will make it possible for some of these low-cost producers to continue to invade the American market without loss. Even the full advantage of the tariff would still leave the price so low, in comparison to domestic costs, that there would be no incentive to overproduction. Therefore, we shall have a rate which (a) permits a substantial portion of American production to survive; (b) which permits a substantial revenue to the Government from the imports which are calculated to come to us regardless of price, (c) which automatically protects the public against a price gouge; (d) yet which, for this latter reason, is calculated to produce a livable stabilized domestic price, free from the fluctuations which have been the bane of existence for fabricators and manufacturers as well as producers.

Fact No. 8. This amendment offers no danger to American refiners and smelters and their American business. They can refine imported copper in bond and send it back into the world's market without burden or interruption or added cost. They can refine American copper the same as ever. Indeed, it is to their distinct advantage that a supply of domestic copper to be refined should be maintained. Otherwise they may automatically share the present desperation of domestic copper itself. American smelters and refiners had a lucrative business in the treatment of foreign copper in 1928. But much of it has since been threatened or lost. This loss has been due to the recent construction of modern smelters and refineries abroad. Belgium has expanded its refining facilities to meet the requirements of Katanga. Canada has completed one large smelter and two refineries. Germany has a new refinery. Sweden and Russia now have new refining plants under construction. There is no question about this trend. The report of the Tariff Commission at page 62 specifically points it out. Far from threatening the prosperity of domestic smelters and refineries, the proposed amendment actually promises to save an ore supply for them and thus to defend them against the real threat of emigrating business. They can still handle foreign business, I repeat, without interruption, if they can continue to get it. When they can't get it, this amendment will give them the assurance of some domestic business to do. No American smelter or refiner needs to fear this amendment unless—as in the case of the one hostile witness before the Finance Committee—his corporation is more interested in its alien copper investments than in its domestic operations. I submit that these alien considerations are not entitled to be persuasive with us at a moment when the Senate is charged with the dreadful responsibility of serving and saving the United States.

Fact No. 9. This amendment offers no danger to American fabricators and manufacturers. For their export trade they are protected by the familiar draw-back which leaves them upon even terms in their competition for foreign markets. For their domestic trade they are protected in price differentials by reasonable and adequate compensatory rates. These are not shotgun guesses. They are not stabs in the dark. The whole proposed rate structure has been as scrupulously studied as any tariffs that ever reached the statute books. They have been canvassed in repeated conferences with fabricators and manufacturers to verify their integrity. They have been painstakingly surveyed by and with the experts of the Tariff Commission. Their administrative feasibility has been approved by the Commissioner of Customs, who unhesitatingly says the schedule is practical. They have been studied in conjunction with the Senate's legislative counsel. No precaution has been ignored or avoided. Under these terms the entire industry—meaning the American industry—is safe. Witnesses, speaking for copper fabricators and manufacturers, have so testified to the Finance Committee. The sole question at the bar of the Senate is whether we want the American industry to be safe. Our sympathies and our judgments are in the jury box. It is a capital case. The verdict spells life or death for American livelihood in all or part of Arizona, Utah, Montana, Michigan, Nevada, New Mexico, California, Tennessee, Colorado, and North Carolina—with copper also present in Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Texas, Pennsylvania, and Georgia. Truly it is a nonsectional, nonpartisan, national emergency demanding answer in kind.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from Hon. V. S. K. HOUSTON, Delegate from Hawaii, transmitting copy of resolutions adopted by the board of supervisors of the county of Maui, Territory of Hawaii, protesting against the passage of legislation that would restrict or curtail the rights, duties, and privileges of the citizens of Hawaii in respect of local self-government, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Cook County (Ill.) Board of Commissioners favoring a $5,000,000,000 prosperity loan to establish a nation-wide program of public-work improvements, which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from a citizen of Rochester, N. Y., praying for the loaning of $1,000,000,000 at between 2 and 3 per cent to the railroads of America so as to create employment and help business, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Tacoma (Wash.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring the balancing of the Budget and substantial retrenchment in governmental expenditures, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from George A. Hartley, M. D., of Battle Creek, Iowa, favoring the loaning of sufficient money to the railroads to buy their own bonds, also the balancing of the Budget and retrenchment in governmental expenditures, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from Joe I. Cromwell, of Muskogee, Okla., praying that the Senate include sufficient funds in the appropriations for the Army to continue the services of officers retired or detailed to active duty in schools, under the national defense act, to train reserve officers, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from McFarlane & Wiley (experts in economic technique), Chicago, Ill., transmitting copies of their files relative to Budget savings, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Municipal Council of Pangil, Laguna, P. I., favoring the granting of independence to the Philippine Islands, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a memorial of sundry citizens of St. Louis, Mo., remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on the automobile industry and favoring instead some form of general tax to be included in the pending revenue bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Lexington (Ky.) Board of Commerce, signed by Henry K. Milward, its president, favoring the early completion of the congressional legislative program and final adjournment of the present session of Congress in June, 1932, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution presented to the Southern Baptist Convention, St. Petersburg, Fla., favoring the designation of a national day of prayer for America in the present economic crisis, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE presented the petition of officers and members of the Railway Employees Club, of Barstow, Calif., praying for the passage of legislation providing for the regulation of motor vehicles used in the interstate transportation of freight and passengers for hire, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented memorials, numerously signed by sundry citizens of Los Angeles and vicinity, in the State of California, remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on the automobile industry in the pending revenue bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TYDINGS presented resolutions adopted by United States Marines Post, No. 1, and Second Division Post, No. 27, both of the American Legion, Baltimore, Md., favoring the passage of legislation eliminating or reducing the interest rate on loans to veterans on adjusted-service certificates, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of the State of Maryland, remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on the automobile industry and favoring instead the adoption of some form of general tax in the pending tax bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH presented letters in the nature of memorials from several citizens of the State of Maryland, remonstrating against reductions in the compensation of Federal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a memorial, from E. C. Graham, jr., of Baltimore, Md., remonstrating against the adoption of section 502 (b) and (c) of House bill 11267, the legislative appropriation bill, relative to utilizing the services of officers in the Engineer Corps of the Army on public works, construction, and activities, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a letter from the Kalak Water Co., New York City, N. Y., setting forth the fact that Kalak water is offered solely as a medicine and protesting against the proposal to tax it as a bottled mineral water, which, with the accompanying paper, was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a memorial from Charles H. Knapp, president of the International League of Professional Baseball Clubs, Baltimore, Md., remonstrating against the amusements tax being made applicable to minor-league baseball clubs, and favoring the exemption thereof, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a memorial from the Baltimore Chewing Gum Co., of Baltimore, Md., remonstrating against the imposition of a 3 per cent tax on chewing gum, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented letters and telegrams from sundry citizens of Baltimore and Odenton, Md., and New York City, N. Y., urging various changes and amendments in the pending revenue bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials and letters in the nature of memorials from sundry citizens and organizations in the State of Maryland, remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on the automobile industry in the pending revenue bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented letters in the nature of memorials from several publishing companies and other firms of Baltimore, Md., and New York, N. Y., remonstrating against increases in postage rates, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented letters in the nature of petitions from several citizens and organizations in the State of Maryland, praying for inclusion of a manufacturers' sales tax in the pending revenue bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented letters and telegrams in the nature of memorials from sundry citizens and organizations in the State of Maryland, remonstrating against the imposition of a tax on bank checks, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BARBOUR presented a resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the Plainfields, of Plainfield, N. J., favoring the balancing of the Budget and retrenchment in governmental expenditures, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Corporal Mathews-Purnell Post, No. 518, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, of Camden, N. J., protesting against reductions in appropriations for the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REDUCTION IN OFFICER PERSONNEL OF THE ARMY

Mr. BARBOUR presented a letter from Hon. Clifford R. Powell, New Jersey State senator, of Mount Holly, N. J., relative to proposed reduction in the officer personnel of the Regular Army, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOUNT HOLLY, N. J., May 20, 1932.

Hon. WARREN G. BARBOUR,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I believe that the proposed reduction in officer personnel of the Regular Army would be a very serious mistake. I am particularly interested as an officer of the New Jersey National Guard with nearly 20 years of service.

Great strides in efficiency have been made by the National Guard in this country since we have had sufficient Regular Army personnel assigned to us for inspection and instruction. The proposed reduction will bring about a serious reduction in the number of officers available for training of the National Guard.

As you know, the National Guard is virtually a volunteer army and is now part of our first-line defense. It is absolutely necessary to the maintenance of proper efficiency that the present allotment of Regular Army officers with the National Guard be continued.

I inclose herewith data giving other reasons, to all of which I personally subscribe.

Very truly yours,

CLIFFORD R. POWELL.

REDUCTION OF ARMY OFFICERS

1. The Army appropriation bill proposes to reduce the commissioned strength of the Army to 10,000, made up as follows:

Promotion-list officers	8,930
Non-promotion-list officers	1,070
Total authorized strength	10,000

Based on the estimated strength as of July 1, 1932, this will require reductions as follows:

Promotion-list officers	1,814
Non-promotion-list officers	356
Total reduction	2,170

2. The selection of the officers to accomplish this reduction is confined to those most advanced in age in each grade, with a provision that 5 per cent of such older officers in each grade may be retained and younger officers selected in lieu thereof.

3. Any reduction is inimical to our national defense: 14,063 officers is the minimum required to enable the Regular Army reasonably to carry out its mission prescribed by Congress in the national defense act. Due to appropriation limitations the annual average has been kept down to 12,000, with a consequent shortage of officers with many of the Army's most important functions.

4. A reduction as now proposed necessarily will result in a drastic curtailment of Army activities in training the civilian components—National Guard, Organized Reserves, and Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

5. Such a reduction will make it impossible to maintain the small, balanced, mobile force so necessary for emergencies.

6. It will make it impossible to man, even in part, our essential seacoast defenses.

7. It will not permit the Army to provide anything approaching adequate garrisons for our overseas possessions.

8. Even with the present strength the shortage of officers with troop units is a matter of grave concern.

9. The Army school system would be wrecked. The World War demonstrated the necessity of these schools for the training of officers. Just as trained officers are keystones in national defense, the schools are keystones in the officers' training.

10. The saving reported by the committee, which exceeds the War Department estimate, amounts to less than 3 per cent of the amount expended for pay of the Army. In comparison with the damage to national defense which would result, such a saving is triflingly insignificant. From the standpoint of national defense it is manifestly a penny-wise and pound-foolish proposition.

11. In normal times such a reduction would be serious enough, but in the present state of world affairs it well might result in a national catastrophe. To literally hamstring national defense as such a reduction would do is a responsibility thinking men and women will hesitate to assume.

12. Realizing the extreme danger to our country of effecting an economy by reducing the Army, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House, Mr. BYRNS, on April 5, 1932, at a hearing before the Economy Committee made the following statement to the Secretary of War, Mr. Hurley.

"It does seem to me that a man like yourself, who is a real business man, as secretary of national defense, could make considerable saving, not by reducing the Army personnel, because I do not want to see that done; not by reducing the Navy, because I have always stood for preparedness; but in the administrative cost."

13. A drastic contraction of Medical Department activities necessarily would result. Those pertaining to the National Guard, the Organized Reserves, and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps will have to be practically abandoned, and the care of the veterans will, of necessity, be greatly curtailed.

14. Finally, due to the necessary drastic curtailments of many essential activities, the provisions of and the policies laid down by the national defense act would be practically nullified; the morale of the Army personnel would be shattered; and our national defense dealt a staggering blow.

METHOD OF REDUCTION

1. The method proposed for the selection of the officers to accomplish the reduction is even more astounding than the reduction itself. With the 5 per cent leeway the selection must be based on age alone.

2. Such a plan is purely arbitrary and has nothing to recommend it.

3. Relative professional or physical fitness is excluded from consideration.

4. Individual efficiency as demonstrated by records of service is pushed out of the picture.

5. A large percentage (many times greater than 5 per cent) of the best trained, most efficient officers of the widest experience in the Army would be forced out.

6. The interests of the Government are in no way conserved by this arbitrary method.

7. If there must be a reduction, the yardstick of efficiency is the only sound basis for selection.

8. In the event of any reduction the Government has the right to retain the most efficient officers, and the interests of national defense demand their retention.

9. Many colonels of the ability, efficiency, and experience for selection as general officers would be ruthlessly plucked on the eve of achieving the culmination of a successful military career.

10. Likewise high ranking officers in the other grades would be forced out just prior to promotion to a grade where they would be among the youngest officers in the grade, while less efficient officers would be retained.

11. This age-alone method takes no account of the special technical and professionel requirements of the different branches of the Army, with the result that certain branches—e. g., the Quartermaster Corps, the Finance Department, and the Judge Advocate General's Department—would lose considerably more than 50 per cent of their personnel.

12. The statement in the committee's report that this reduction would serve to correct unfortunate promotion conditions has no basis in fact, is misleading and absolutely incorrect except as to the limited acceleration due to the small reduction on May 31, 1933, to make room for the 1933 West Point class.

13. To the contrary, the removal of the 2,000 older officers would so delay and diminish retirements for age, a potent source of attrition, as to materially retard rather than accelerate promotion.

14. Entire classes of the Military Academy will be forced out under this method. The great majority of the officers affected are in the prime of their usefulness, far removed from normal retirement.

15. A striking injustice would be done World War officers who entered the Army in 1920. The national defense act (June 4, 1920), under the provisions of which these officers came into the Army, provided the following minimum age requirements for appointment in grades as follows:

	Years
Colonel	48
Lieutenant colonel	45
Major	36

Forced by act of Congress to be of such age in 1920 before they could enter the Army, they now of necessity, by the mere passage of time, are among those who would be forced out by act of Congress. It is inconceivable that the Congress will permit such an injustice to be consummated.

16. Present calculations under this age-alone method show that every officer appointed in 1920 in the grades of colonel, lieutenant colonel, and major of necessity will be included in the group who are forced out.

17. Contrary to the committee's report practically none of these officers are receiving the higher pay rates for their grades. Many of them receive as much as $150 per month less than younger officers in the same grade who will be retained.

18. It is apparent that the age-alone method does not provide the maximum saving.

19. Among those affected by this age-alone method would be many distinguished officers of both Spanish-American and World War service, including numerous recipients of the medal of honor, distinguished-service cross, distinguished-service medal, and silver-star citation for gallantry in action. The 5 per cent leeway is far from sufficient to take care of them.

20. The inference in the committee's report that this age-alone method is in accord with the recommendation of the Interdepartmental Pay Personnel Board is decidedly misleading and inaccurate. This board's report in its entirety clearly shows they recommended that any compulsory removals should be made solely upon the basis of efficiency with a view to retaining those officers who are of greatest value to the service.

CONCLUSION

Retrenchment that cripples national defense is not economy. Everything in war, and for war, can be improvised except the trained officer. An efficient and sufficient corps of officers spells the difference between victory and defeat.

Skilled officers, like all other professional men, are the result of continuous and laborious study, training, and experience. There is no short cut to the peculiar type of knowledge they must possess.

To deplete our already inadequate corps of officers would be a most serious blow to our national defense; to accomplish such depletion by forcing out skilled officers due to age alone would be unsound in principle, unfair, and unjust both to the officers and to their country—an extravagance rather than an economy.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHEELER presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Montana, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures after the first, as follows:

HAVRE, MONT.

Hon. B. K. WHEELER,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: We, the undersigned citizens of Montana, would appreciate anything you could do in regard to having the silver bill passed, that is now pending. An establishment of a bimetallic system of currency, employing gold and silver, would be the greatest thing that has ever been done for this State and Nation.

We urge an early passage of the silver bill as introduced by you in Congress.

HARRY SODERBERG (and others).

WOLF POINT, MONT.

We, the undersigned citizens of Roosevelt County, Mont., believing that agriculture is one of our basic industries and that the economic security of our Nation is dependent upon the economic security of the American farm, favor such legislation as will provide for the solvency of the American farmer.

We believe that the only way out of the present depression is to raise commodity prices and thereby reduce the burden of debt. Under the present gold standard debts contracted three years ago, if paid this year, would require three times the amount in farm commodities as when they were contracted. All of the important countries of the world have gone off the gold standard except France; it is therefore impossible for us to trade with them. This keeps commodity prices down.

We feel that if prosperity is to return to this country, we must go off the gold standard, which is the cause for most of our economic ills.

We, therefore, respectfully petition the Senate of the United States of America to pass the Wheeler silver bill, No. S. 2487, which provides for the remonetization of silver by providing for the free coinage of silver as well as gold at the fixed ratio of 16 to 1.

P. R. DOUGHERTY (and others).

REPORT OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

Mr. BORAH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 96) to punish the sending through the mails of certain threatening communications, reported it with an amendment and submitted an additional report (No. 727) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 4739) conferring jurisdiction on the United States District Court for the District of Oregon to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the suit in equity of Rakha Singh Gherwal against the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TRAMMELL:

A bill (S. 4740) granting a pension to Mary Estella Vail; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HATFIELD:

A bill (S. 4741) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Wellsburg, W. Va.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma:

A bill (S. 4742) authorizing and directing that 5 per cent of any amount or amounts hereafter appropriated to pay judgment or judgments in favor of the Cherokee Indians by the Court of Claims be paid to Frank J. Boudinot, in full for his services and expenses for and on behalf of said Indians prior to July 19, 1923, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 4743) granting a pension to Jessica G. Roome; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHIPSTEAD:

A bill (S. 4744) for the relief of Howland & Waltz Co. (Ltd.); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 4745) granting an increase of pension to Catherine Grady (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 4746) to authorize the closing of a portion of Virginia Avenue SE., in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. WAGNER:

A bill (S. 4747) to provide for the entry under bond of exhibits of arts, sciences, and industries, and products of the soil, mine, and sea; to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (S. 4748) authorizing the Secretary of War to lease or to sell certain lands and buildings known as Fort Schuyler, N. Y., to the city of New York; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 4749) granting a pension to Matthew A. Henson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HULL:

A bill (S. 4750) to amend the tariff act of 1930, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. BINGHAM:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 164) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors; ordered to lie on the table.

By Mr. SMITH:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 166) to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to purchase certain State teachers' salary certificates; to the Committee on Finance.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 6477) to further amend the naturalization laws, and for other purposes, and it was signed by the Vice President.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF A BILL

Messages in writing from the President of the United States, submitting nominations, were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that on May 23, 1932, the President approved and signed the act (S. 4193) to authorize the issuance of bonds by the St. Thomas Harbor Board, Virgin Islands, for the acquisition or construction of a graving or dry dock.

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in this morning's Washington Herald entitled "Pershing Speaks."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington Herald, May 24, 1932]

PERSHING SPEAKS

A word from General Pershing carries great weight.

His position in the life of the Nation is unique. He is regarded with universal respect and affection. He speaks rarely and never at length. Since the close of the World War he has been careful to refrain from participation in political or partisan activity of any kind.

Just as in the war he represented the Nation's united purpose and composite strength, his occasional utterances since the war seem not the expression of an individual viewpoint but rather that of a broad and comprehensive national opinion.

In an article in the current issue of the American Magazine General Pershing discusses the prevalence of crime and the spread of corruption, which he regards as a grave menace to our well-being and the perpetuity of our institutions.

He stresses the duty which rests upon the individual citizen to make his influence felt on the side of law and order, and to that end he suggests the organization of local committees to vigilantly supervise the maintenance of the law, bringing support to faithful officials and discipline or replacement wherever they fail in their duty.

General Pershing admits that he has in mind the vigilance committees of olden times in our frontier communities which, by simple and straightforward measures, preserved respect for law when violent crime seemed gaining the upper hand.

He does not hesitate to connect the vain attempt to enforce prohibition with the great growth of the bootlegging business.

"I am convinced," says he, "that prohibition has largely financed the new postwar underworld of ours. Vast profits have drawn multitudes into the bootlegging business, and once outside the pale of the law, they do not hesitate to turn to racketeering and other forms of crime. Thus a criminal army has been built up which defies the very Government itself."

These are pregnant words, uttered by one of the most illustrious of Americans—a man whose love of country can not be questioned and who has served it with a patriot's zeal. It is the true voice of America.

General Pershing speaks not as the Scribes and Pharisees but as one with authority.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE POLITICAL SITUATION

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, Members of the Congress must have been impressed with a persistent and what seems to be concerted effort to bring the Congress into disrepute and disfavor and to point to the President as the one patriotic personality in public life. An article by Mr. Carlisle Bargeron in the morning Washington Herald is appropriate to that effort. I ask that the article be incorporated in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Washington Herald, May 24, 1932]

THE LISTENING POST

By Carlisle Bargeron

It was perhaps poetic justice that two groups of congressional kibitzers should get caught yesterday in such silly errors as to cause mirthful relief to the strained nerves of Capitol Hill.

First it developed that the man to whom Mr. Hoover addressed his letter of Sunday denouncing the public works bond issue does not, so far as known, even exist. Certainly the addressee to whom

Mr. Hoover poured out his heart, Richard S. Parker, of New York, is not the president of the American Society of Civil Engineers for whom the letter was intended. The president of the society, instead, is Mr. Herbert S. Crocker, of Denver.

Fortunately, the letter was carried in the newspapers, so Mr. Hoover's position is known, whether his letter is ever delivered or not.

Then there was another letter over the week-end, apparently gotten up by that eminent kibitzer, Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler. It is surprising that men like Governor Ritchie and Al Smith lent their names to it except that it is the smart thing to do, nowadays, to blame it all on Congress.

This letter boldly called upon Congress to lay aside partisan consideration and work for the good of the country. Of course, Congress hasn't been trying to do that. Only the President and our Nicholas Murray Butlers and our Wall Street brokers and our bankers are working unselfishly for the country.

Well, at any rate the letter was addressed to Representative CRISP as the "majority leader" of the House. Mr. CRISP is not even the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee with which he has been identified. He is the acting chairman.

In so far as Professor Butler is concerned I believe this reflects how much he really knows about Congress, and the same would apply to the great majority of those bankers, brokers, and others who have joined in the general propaganda against it, the most vicious I have seen in my time and a propaganda which, in my opinion, is downright dangerous.

And the propaganda has a purpose, of course.

It is inspired by administration sources with a view to turning the light from Mr. Hoover and making it appear that had it not been for the obstructionist tactics he would have put through a program that would have gotten the country out of its mess.

This political strategy is not new. Indeed, it is used on the eve of every campaign. The Republicans in Congress subscribe to it and aid it. The party in power bases its campaign around its President.

If he can be built up, then the individuals running for the House and Senate have only to run as a "supporter" of his. They are not hurt as individuals in the propaganda against Congress, because the propaganda is not directed against any individual but against that highly nebulous body—Congress.

The absurdity of it all would be apparent to anyone who gave any thought to it, because there are more than 500 men composing the body.

This particular campaign, however, is more vicious than any I have ever seen, and there is a serious question as to whether it in itself is not what is retarding recovery as much as anything else.

If business is so frightened about Congress that it simply can not move until it adjourns, what is it that made business that way? The answer, of course, is the propaganda that has been leveled against the Congress, so strong and vicious in this instance, that unquestionably the country has lost confidence in it. If that is a pretty situation in times like this, I'll eat my hat.

Because Congress has got to stay here until it finishes its job, regardless of the Nicholas Murray Butlers, the bankers, or the brokers.

I have just read on the financial pages that the market was a little nervous yesterday because the House didn't pass the beer bill.

Mr. Hoover is calling 30 or more of the country's outstanding newspaper publishers to the White House either to-morrow or the next day. I don't know just what his purpose is. Maybe it is another move to get everybody cooperating.

Maybe it is to heap on more propaganda against Congress. Maybe the stuff which the Washington correspondents are writing for these papers should be censored.

Whatever is the purpose, these publishers will get a lot of light on the situation if they ask Mr. Hoover as soon as they sit down if it is true that he had intended to use his influence against the insertion of the tariff items in the tax bill, but was called off by Republican leaders on the ground that if four Republican Senators didn't get this tariff protection they would be defeated in the coming campaign.

It is, of course, the fight over these tariff items that is now holding up the revenue bill. Mr. Hoover's leadership would have saved considerable time.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, at a meeting of the Finance Committee this morning the question of taxation on mutual insurance companies on insurance against losses by hail, cyclone, and so forth, was taken up for consideration. By a unanimous vote of the committee it was decided that the amendments heretofore proposed by the committee relating to this matter be disagreed to in order that the existing law, which is the House text, may remain as it is.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator if that is the part of the bill upon which the committee had hearings just the other day?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it is.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I say to the Senator from Nebraska that this action in the committee was taken on motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I send the amendments to the desk and ask that they be disagreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendments be stated in their order.

The first amendment stated was, on page 63, after line 4, to strike out:

(11) Farmers' or other mutual hail, cyclone, casualty, or fire insurance companies or associations (including interinsurers and reciprocal underwriters) the income of which is used or held for the purpose of paying losses or expenses.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

(11) Mutual hail, cyclone, casualty, or fire insurance companies or associations (including interinsurers and reciprocal underwriters) of the type commonly known as "farmers," "county," "town," or "local" mutuals, the income of which is used or held for the purpose of paying losses or expenses.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment stated was, on page 156, line 15, after the word "sums," to strike out "other than dividends paid" and insert "(other than dividends) paid or incurred," so as to read:

(B) The sums (other than dividends) paid or incurred within the taxable year on policy and annuity contracts.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment stated was, on page 157, line 8, after the word "their," to strike out "policyholders and the amount of premium deposits retained for the payment of losses, expenses, and reinsurance reserves" and insert "policyholders, and, unless otherwise allowed, a reasonable net addition to reinsurance reserves," so as to read:

(3) Mutual insurance companies other than life and marine. In the case of mutual insurance companies (including interinsurers and reciprocal underwriters, but not including mutual life or mutual marine insurance companies) requiring their members to make premium deposits to provide for losses and expenses, the amount of premium deposits returned to their policyholders, and, unless otherwise allowed, a reasonable net addition to reinsurance reserves.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I presume it will not be necessary to read again the amendment which I submitted last night. I desire to offer it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska offers the amendment which he submitted last evening.

AMELIA EARHART PUTNAM

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I desire to introduce and ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to present the distinguished-flying cross to Amelia Earhart Putnam. I would like to make a statement with reference to it after the joint resolution shall have been read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the joint resolution be read for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 165) authorizing the President of the United States to present the distringuished-flying cross to Amelia Earhart Putnam was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is authorized to present the distinguished-flying cross to Amelia Earhart Putnam for displaying heroic courage and skill as a navigator, at the risk of her life, by her nonstop flight in her plane, unnamed, from Harbor Grace, Newfoundland, to Londonderry, Ireland, on May 20, 1932, by which she became the first and only woman, and the second person, to cross the Atlantic Ocean in a plane in solo flight, and also established new records for speed and elapsed time between the two continents.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, Amelia Earhart Putnam made her notable trans-Atlantic flight on exactly the fifth anniversary of the flight of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, on May 20, 1927, which startled the whole world.

Vice president of the National Aeronautical Association, she first obtained her license to fly in 1920. Subsequently she was awarded the first F. A. I. license granted to a woman
